NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF 'THE GREAT LONE LAND.'

FAR OUT: Rovings Retold.

By Lieut.-Col. W. F. BUTLER, C.B.,

Author of 'The Wild North Land,' &c.

Post 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"Written in the vigorous style which has secured the author so many admirers, and full of spirit, deep appreciation of the beauties of nature, and a spirit of justice to his fellow men, no matter what the colour of their hides may be
Col. Butler tells some truths which will be very unpalatable to our colonial friends and to the chauvinism which our race do so much to encourage under the specious pretext that greed of other men's goods is another name for civilisation."

Army and Navy Gazette.

"Col. Butler has not merely glanced at the scenes of which he writes—he has lived in them; and not a week of the many months which he has spent alone on the prairie or under the frozen pines of northernmost America has been without its result in his pictures of them. The introductory chapter on the colonial policy of England is also worthy of careful attention, for Col. Butler is as liberal and original a thinker as he is a poetical describer."—Tribune.

"Col. Butler is always striking and vigorous, and with the master-touch of a great painter presents to his readers a vivid picture executed in a few bold strokes."—Record.

GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

A letter received: "Gentlemen, - It may perhaps interest you to know that, after an extended trial I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit with or without medical treatment, in almost all forms of throat disease. They soothe and clear the voice. In no case can they do any harm. Yours faithfully, Gordon Holmes, L.R.C.P.E.

HIS LIFE, LETTERS, AND OPINIONS.

By JOHN H. INGRAM.

With Portraits of Poe and his Mother.

"Remarkable experiences are usually confined to the inner life of imaginative men, but Poe's biography displays a vicissitude and peculiarity of interest such as is rarely met with. A man whose remarkable genius it were folly to deny."—James Russell Lowell.

PRESS NOTICES.

"This Life of Poe contains much that is interesting, with some information that is new to us. Mr. Ingram appears to have taken a creditably dispassionate view of the complex and wayward character of the unhappy subject of his memoir."—Times.

"Mr. Ingram is to be congratulated upon his industry, for he has collected a great many particulars in regard to the life of Poe."—New York Herald.

"There is no character that offers more scope for analysis than Poe's, and Mr. Ingram is the only writer who has provided us with all the necessary material for the study. His most interesting work bears upon it the double stamp of conscientious thoroughness and impartiality, that is not lessened because it is sympathetic."—Californian's Messenger.

"Justice has at length been done to a very singular and very wonderful genius. Few works of greater interest than this have been published, because Mr. Ingram knows how to write biography in such a way as to enable us to see the gradual development of Poe's heart and mind, his nature as poet and man."—Broad Arrow.

"Mr. Ingram's Life of Poe we may commend as 'full and faithful.' The author has exhibited uncommon industry and patience in the collection of his materials."—New York Tribune.

"It is pleasant to congratulate Mr. Ingram upon the close of his labours. Seldom has a duty so arduous and necessary been performed with equal loyalty and zeal. Profoundly interesting from commencement to close is this biography now given to the world."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Ingram has taken up arms against fearful odds; has boldly proclaimed that he would vindicate Poe, and has triumphed. Both volumes are replete with letters, anecdotes, personal recollections of the poet's contemporaries, and extracts from the opinions of competent critics, woven in a manner that most effectively relieves the tediousness too often attaching to biographies."—Richmond Standard (U.S.A.).

"In these two volumes we have the result of many years' research, set forth with all the energy and skill of a profound and conscientious biographer. Never, perhaps, has there been a more paradoxical fact than that of Poe. Mr. Ingram's merits are very great, and his book is very welcome. While he is resolved to make an end of the vile calumnies by which Poe's biography has been enveloped, he is ready to admit Poe's faults and lapses. We thus feel that we are brought into contact with a real man, and not with a shadow."—Spectator.

"The work is a valuable contribution to the literature of biography. We may even call it with truth the most satisfactory Life of Poe that exists."—New York Evening Post.

"The literary merits of the work, well sustained to the close, are on a par with the wealth and accuracy of material of which it is composed. It will command, as it deserves to do, a high position as an impartial and able biography of one who was so unfortunate in death as in life, but whose place in literature—so far as graceful and musical versification is concerned, together with a weird glamour of which he was master—has not yet been filled."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"No feature of the book is more valuable than the letters which it contains written by Poe. He was, indeed, a marvellous letter-writer."—Scotsman.

"The thorough and exhaustive nature of Mr. Ingram's work is a matter for congratulation. He has done his work excellently, and in doing it has rendered a service to English literature."—Birmingham Post.

"The value of Mr. Ingram's book lies in its completeness, no single work containing so much of what is extant in periodicals and private collections."—New York Times.

"The two volumes contain such a good account, with extracts, of Poe's writings, that, having read them, we know more not only of the facts of his life but of his works than we are otherwise likely to do. He made his mark. We heartily recommend Mr. Ingram's book to all who want to know all about Poe."—Grainger.

"Mr. Ingram has a distinct title to write the book which he has written. He has succeeded in clearing Poe of almost all the most odious and discreditable of the charges under which he has laboured, and in presenting a really pathetic picture of the terrible state of mental excitement and bodily suffering into which he finally passed."—Full Mill Gazette.

"Certainly Mr. Ingram's life bears unmistakable evidence of painstaking research, and we should think it as 'full and faithful' as he could make it. There cannot be a question as to the extraordinary character of Poe's genius. Many have, perhaps, thought that he resembled Byron in a marked degree. One cannot help thinking of Shelley, Keats, and Byron. There were features in all three which found a correspondence in Poe. But he was not really like one of them."—Literary World.

"A Bibliography of Poe's Works and a Copious Index are contained in the Appendix."

CONTENTS.

Part I.—MORAL SELF-CULTURE. Chap. 1. At Home. Chap. 2. Life Abroad. Chap. 3. Character. Chap. 4. Conduct.

Part II.—MENTAL SELF-CULTURE. Chap. 1. How to Read. Chaps. 2 to 9. Courses of Reading in English Poetry, History, Biography, Fiction, Travel and Discovery, Theology, Philosophy and Metaphysics, Miscellaneous, Science and Scientific Text-Books. Chap. 10. How to Write: English Composition.

Part III.—PHYSICAL SELF-CULTURE. "Many men in corpore state."

"We like the thorough way in which Mr. Adams deals with 'Self-Culture: Moral, Mental, and Physical.' His chapters on the courtesies of home life, and the true relation between parent and child, are especially valuable nowadays."

As an incentive to mental culture, Mr. Adams gives a fairly complete list of famous English authors, with brief and often very pertinent criticisms. He certainly answers the question, 'Is life worth living?' in a most triumphant affirmative, and his book is sure to do real good to any young person in whose hands it may be placed."—Grainger.

"Books for young men are constantly appearing—some of them genuine, earnest, and useful, and many of them mere products of the art of book-making. We have pleasure in saying that this volume by Mr. Adams deserves to take its place among the best of the first-mentioned class. It is fresh, interesting, varied, and, above all, full of common sense, manliness, and right principle. The young man who takes up this book will find that he is neither preached at nor scolded, but directed to true and elevated aims, and braced up to persevering effort."—Liverpool Courier.

"We can trace the same energy of purpose, wide views, and laborious research which distinguished Mr. Davenport Adams's previous work ('Woman's Work and Worth').... It is a book which may be put into the hands of young men with the greatest confidence that it will be a help to them in the work of self-culture and discipline. The book is a thoroughly healthy one."—Church Times.

WOMAN'S WORK and WORTH in GIRLHOOD, MAIDENHOOD, and WIFEHOOD. Illustrations of Woman's Character, Duties, Rights, Position, Influence, Responsibilities, and Opportunities. With Hints on Self-Culture and Chapters on the Higher Education and Employment of Women. By W. E. DAVENPORT ADAMS, Author of 'The Secret of Success,' &c. Crown 8vo. 376 pp. cloth, price 2s. 6d.; gilt edges, 4s.

"A perfect gem; full of information without being prosy, abounding in pleasant anecdotes of literary persons, stories of filial love, heroic wives and husbands, together with a concise account of almost every article and literary woman from the earliest periods to the present time."—Dundee Advertiser.

"We like the key in which the author pitches the leading note of his work. He is no mere advocate of so-called 'Woman's Rights,' but is a sober exponent of an education which teaches women—whether maidens, wives, or mothers—the purpose for which they should work, the spirit in which they should work, and the manner in which they should train themselves to be fit for work. The book is not only very interesting, but most thoroughly useful."—Literary Character.

"As an aid and incentive to self-culture in girls, and pure and unexceptionable in tone, this book may be very thoroughly recommended, and deserves a wide circulation."—Englishwoman's Review.

"Women who read the book may well be inspired with pride and hope when they survey such a record of the contributions of their sex to human culture and progress."—Scotsman.

"Many a girl will be benefited by it, and many a parent may be aided by the chapters on education and on occupations for women at the end, with many practical hints."—Nonconformist.

"It is a noble record of the work of women.... and one of the very best books which can be placed in the hands of a girl."—Schoastic World.

1. THE SECRET OF SUCCESS; or, How to Get On in the World. With some Remarks upon the Arts and the Art of making the Best Use of Life. Illustrated with numerous Examples and Anecdotes. By W. E. DAVENPORT ADAMS, Author of 'Plain Living and High Thinking,' &c. Second Edition. Small crown 8vo. 212 pp. cloth, price 2s. 6d.; gilt edges, 4s.

"Mr. Adams's work is in some respects more practical than Mr. Butler's. He takes his illustrations more from the world of business and commerce, and their application is unmistakable. There is much originality and power displayed in the manner in which he imparts his advice on his subject."—Aberdeen Journal.

THE APORIAN and SULI CAMPAIGN.

2. OUR REDCOATS and BLUE JACKETS: WAR PICTURES on LAND and SEA. Telling a Continuation Narrative of the Naval and Military History of England from the Year 1793 to the Present Day, including the Afghan and Sikh Campaigns. SAMUEL TINSLEY & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE NEW WORKS OF FICTION AT ALL LIBRARIES,

EACH IN THREE VOLUMES.

NOTICE.—New Novel by the popular Author of 'Love's Conflict,' 'Woman Against Woman,' 'Petronal,' &c.

WITH CUPID'S EYES. By Florence Marryat,
Author of 'Love's Conflict,' 'Woman Against Woman,' &c. 3 vols. 31s. 6d. [This day.

AMY WYNTER. By Thomas A. Pinkerton. 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

The Spectator says:—"A clever and eminently readable book... It is really excellent.... The merits of the book are everywhere, the reader may open it where he may choose, and will be amused to a certainty."

The Athenæum says:—"The prologue is a romance in itself, and serves, as a good prologue must, to secure the interest of the reader for the more detailed narrative which follows."

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"It is by no means one of those stories which a reviewer can 'sample' with a glance, or gauge at sight, or label with assurance.... It possesses the great attraction of originality and freshness. It contains many excellent passages. Another excellent creation, for the mere sake of making whose acquaintance the book is worth perusing, is Basil Stillingwood, a middle-aged 'gynothrope,' as an ingenious writer has it, who is deservedly adored by all the women who know him."

The Globe says:—"Full of humour and good spirits."

The Daily News says:—"A capital book to read."

The Graphic says:—"A very clever and amusing book."

The BURTONS of DUNROE. By M. W. Brew. 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

The Scotsman says:—"The book is a specimen of careful and intelligent literary workmanship."

The Spectator says:—"An unusually clever and interesting story... The author possesses qualities which are almost as rare as they are valuable: keen sympathy, vivid imagination, strong feelings, and a poetical temperament; the power of observation, and a fiery indignation against wrong and wrongdoers which is attractive and wholesome... The Burtons of Dunroe is a remarkable book."

The Morning Post says:—"There is plenty in the three volumes to repay the judicious reader."

CHARLIE: a Waif's History, Told by Himself. By Mrs. WOODWARD. 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

The DEAN'S WIFE. By Mrs. Eiloart, Author of 'The Curate's Discipline,' 'How He won Her,' &c. 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

John Bull says:—"Any reader who wants a good story thoroughly well told cannot do better than read 'The Dean's Wife.'"

The Scotsman says:—"The Dean's Wife is by no means wanting in interest."

The Graphic says:—"The Dean's Wife must be classed as a decidedly good if not a satisfactory novel."

OCTAVIA'S LOVERS. By the Author of 'Lalage.' 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

The Athenæum says:—"Octavia's Lovers shows a great deal of ability in its author."

CARMELA. By the Princess Olga Cantacuzene, Author of 'In the Spring of My Life.' Translated by EUGENE KLAUS, with the Author's approval. 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

The Daily News says:—"Can be read from beginning to end with interest, rising frequently to admiration."

AFTER a DARK NIGHT—The SUN. By C. G. HAMILTON. 2 vols. 21s.

John Bull says:—"It is a book which can be placed without hesitation in the hands of young girls, and we have no doubt will attain considerable popularity in family circles."

EACH COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME.

Under the Rose: a Prose Idyll. By Mrs. HERBERT DAVY. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The GRAPHIC says:—"The work of a gentlewoman who has the soul of a poet and the refinement of genius. A pleasanter companion for a railway or journeying journey than 'Under the Rose' we cannot conceive. It is impossible to find any fault with it."

Dona Perfecta: a Tale of Modern Spain. By B. PEREZ GALDOS. Translated by D. F. W. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The LIVERPOOL ALBION says:—"It is fresh and accurate."

Mildred Forrester: a Tale of Our Own Times. By "ADMA." Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The WELSHMAN says:—"The style is pleasant and entertaining, and such as to recommend it to all lovers of novel reading."

The Red Cross. Translated from the German by E. J. FELLOWES. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The GRAPHIC says:—"The Red Cross is a novel of some pretensions, and is worth reading."

JOHN BULL says:—"The tale is worthy of recommendation."

TRAVERSE TABLES:

Computed to Four Places Decimals for every Minute of Angle up to 100 of Distance. For the Use of Surveyors and Engineers.

By R. LLOYD GURDEN,

Authorized Surveyor for the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria.

"Mr. Gurden is to be thanked for the extraordinary labour which he has bestowed on facilitating the work of the surveyor....An almost unexampled instance of professional and literary industry."—Athenæum.

"Those who have experience in exact survey-work will best know how to appreciate the enormous amount of labour represented by this valuable book."—Engineer.

"These tables are characterized by absolute simplicity, and the saving of time effected by their use is most material."—Builder.

"Up to the present time no tables for the use of surveyors have been prepared which, in minuteness of detail, can be compared with those compiled by Mr. Gurden.... With the aid of this book the toil of calculation is reduced to a minimum; and not only is time saved, but the risk of error is avoided. Mr. Gurden's book has but to be known, and no engineer's or surveyor's office will be without a copy."—Architect.

By the Author of 'ST OLAVE'S,' &c. 3 vols.

"'Dimplethorpe' is a well written, ingenious, agreeable, and interesting story. The characters are naturally drawn."—St James's Gazette
"The study of character which the author proposed to herself is exhibited with considerable skill. She describes the better sort of village people with pleasant humour."—Athenæum

STRICTLY TIED UP.

"'Strictly Tied Up' is an entertaining story. It is in every sense a novel conceived in a light and happy vein. The scheme of the story is well proportioned, and worked out in all its complications with much care and skill."—Athenæum

"This novel may be described as a comedy of life and character, and in the changing society to which we are introduced the author shows abundant knowledge of the world. There is humour as well as excitement in the volume, and not a few of the descriptions of people and scenery are exceedingly graphic and piquant."—Saturday Review

"'Strictly Tied Up' is a very cleverly constructed novel, as amusing as it is instructive."—James's Gazette
"Strictly Tied Up is a readable novel. The author is exceedingly clever, has seen a good deal of the world, and knows a good deal of society."—Daily News

LORD BRACKENBURY.

By ANNEA S. EDWARDS.
Author of 'Barham's History,' &c. 3 vols.

"'Lord Brackenbury' is a very readable story. The author has well conceived the purpose of high-class novel writing, and succeeded in no small measure in attaining it. There is plenty of variety, cheerful dialogue, and general nerve in the book. Its great charm is the cheerful view of humanity generally taken by the writer."—Athenæum

"A story that can be read with not a little interest. The plot is contrived with much skill, and in the double hero and heroine the reader is provided with a great deal of both exciting and tender reading. The good people all have their parts, but everything turns out for the best in the end."—Edinburgh Review

"It is exciting to a degree, and any reader who fails to finish the three volumes as quickly as possible must be singularly wanting both in curiosity and in the capacity for enjoyment of a thoroughly romantic story."—Post

"Miss Edwards is far too clever and experienced an author not to have produced a pleasant book. 'Lord Brackenbury' is pleasant reading from beginning to end."—Advertiser

"A very good story. Pleasant reading, plenty of variety, and some amusing sketches of modern society."—Daily News

"The merits of this book are manifold. In the first place it fulfils the first duty of a novel in being exceedingly interesting and amusing. Then some of the character drawing is very good. Our last, but not least, words of praise must be for the love-scenes in the story."—Standard

THIRD EDITION.

ROY and VIOLA.

By Mrs. FORRESTER.

Endymion. By the Earl of Beaconsfield. 3 vols. (Longmans & Co.)

There was once a malicious person who said that the sentence in which Mr. Wagg in 'Pendennis' sketches a fancy novel for the Hon. Percy Popjoy was the best description that could possibly be given of Lord Beaconsfield's fictions. It must be owned that "the cardinal in disguise, after being converted by the Bishop of London," has rather a habit of "proposing to the duchess's daughter." Nor is 'Endymion' false to the well-known principles of its author. But it is in every sense of the word a much quieter book than most of its predecessors—quieter in style, in incident, in personal allusions, and in assaults. The lovers of the 'Codrington' style—by the way, Lord Beaconsfield has taken a terrible revenge for 'Codrington' in this very book—may perhaps mourn over the subdued and almost severe tone of the language and setting of 'Endymion.' The lovers of personality will be rather disgusted at the perverse way in which, as it will seem to them—the ingenious way in which, as it will seem to others—the author has mixed and blended the traits of his gallery of portraits. In a curiously happy or a curiously provoking manner, Lord Beaconsfield has so altered the fates of his personages while preserving many of their characteristics, and has combined so many later living figures with so many earlier, that it is hardly possible to set down this person as that in the fashion dear to gossips. There is no need to give an elaborate analysis of the story of 'Endymion'; indeed, from the crowded condition of the canvas, such an analysis would take up altogether too much room. It would not, indeed, detract much from the interest of the book, for that interest does not consist in any revolutions or discoveries, but rather in the successive sketches of the various characters introduced, in the reflections put in their mouths or given, more rarely, as the author's own, and in the adumbration of not a few important historical figures and incidents. Still, a short argument can be given. The hero, Endymion Ferrars (it may be observed that those who stumble at the name Endymion show a surprising ignorance of English history and an equally surprising ignorance of Lord Beaconsfield's fancy for well-sounding names), comes of a race of place-holders whose fortunes collapse at the first Reform Bill. Retirement into the country only postpones the final catastrophe, and the twin children, Myra and Endymion, are left, when scarcely more than girl and boy, with nothing but a certain connexion and, on Endymion's side, a clerkship in Somerset House. There for some time Endymion lives in nondescript but pleasant society, consisting partly of his fellow clerks, partly of the frequenters of the house in which he lodges—frequenters who range from peers of the realm through crotchety young men of genius to successful tailors. The crotchety young man of genius, George Waldershare, is perhaps the most unmistakable portrait of the book, and certainly one of the very best. He wanders about Europe, suggesting to the Duke of Modena the importance of being ready to take part in a Jacobite revolution in England; the education of his landlady's pretty sister Imogene "occasions him several sonnets"; and his views of the merits of Toryism are wholly delightful:—

"Occasionally there was only conversation, that is to say, Waldershare held forth, dilating on some wondrous theme, full of historical anecdote, and dazzling paradox, and happy phrases. All listened with interest, even those who did not understand him. Much of his talk was addressed really to Beaumaris, whose mind he was forming, as well as that of Imogene. Beaumaris was an hereditary Whig, but had not personally committed himself, and the ambition of Waldershare was to transform him not only into a Tory, but one of the old rock, a real Jacobite. 'Is not the Tory party,' Waldershare would exclaim, 'a succession of heroic spirits, "beautiful and swift," ever in the van, and foremost of their age?—Hobbes and Bolingbroke, Hume and Adam Smith, Wyndham and Cobham, Pitt and Grenville, Canning and Huskisson?—Are not the principles of Toryism those popular rights which men like Shippen and Hynde Cotton flung in the face of an alien monarch and his mushroom aristocracy?—Place bills, triennial bills, opposition to standing armies, to peerage bills?—Are not the traditions of the Tory party the noblest pedigree in the world? Are not its illustrations that glorious martyrology, that opens with the name of Falkland and closes with the name of Canning?' 'I believe it is all true,' whispered Lord Beaumaris to Sylvia, who had really never heard of any of these gentlemen before, but looked most sweet and sympathetic. 'He is a wonderful man—Mr. Waldershare,' said Mr. Vigo to Rodney, 'but I fear not practical.'"

As George Waldershare is the most prominent of Endymion's friends out of office, so Mr. St. Barbe is the most remarkable of his associates in it. St. Barbe is a clever, but as yet unsuccessful, novelist of a cynical kind. But personally he is devoured with envy of Gushy, his rival, whose works sell by the thousand; of the aristocracy, who do not invite him to dinner; of the under-secretaries and permanent officials at the heads of departments, who receive salaries which would keep men of genius in comfort. We wish we had not to say that the original of Mr. St. Barbe is as clearly recognizable as the original of George Waldershare; the retaliation for 'Codrington,' to which we have alluded, hardly excuses the merciless exaggeration of faults which after all made up but a small part of the character of the greatest English novelist of his day. However, mercy, as his warmest admirers will admit, is not exactly Lord Beaconsfield's distinguishing quality.

"I hate the craft," said St. Barbe, with an expression of genuine detestation; 'I should like to show them all up before I died. I suppose it was your sister marrying a lord that got you on in this way. I could have married a countess myself, but then, to be sure, she was only a Polish one, and hard up. I never had a sister; I never had any luck in life at all. I wish I had been a woman. Women are the only people who get on. A man works all his life, and thinks he has done a wonderful thing if, with one leg in the grave and no hair on his head, he manages to get a coronet; and a woman dances at a ball with some young fellow or other, or sits next to some old fellow at dinner and pretends she thinks him charming, and he makes her a peeress on the spot. Oh! it is a disgusting world; it must end in revolution. Now you tell your master, Mr. Sidney Wilton, that if he wants to strengthen the institutions of this country, the government should establish an order of merit, and the press ought to be represented in it. I do not speak only for myself; I speak for my brethren. Yes, sir, I am not ashamed of my order.'"

While Endymion is thus living pleasantly, but in comparative obscurity, his more enterprising sister Myra has taken upon herself the task of rescuing herself and her brother from their evil fate. She becomes companion to Adriana Neuchatel, the only child of a great financier. The Neuchatel household is very carefully drawn, and is one of the pleasantest sketches in the book. In a more agreeable sense than that in which the term has been just used, Lord Beaconsfield's Mr. Neuchatel may be said to be a retaliation for Balzac's Nucingen, though, of course, the originals are not absolutely identical. Her position here, which is altogether that of a friend and equal, introduces Myra, and with her Endymion, to very lofty society, and the political portraits, already sufficiently thickly strewn about the book, come thicker and thicker. A great marriage is clearly Myra's only chance, and she finds the convenient and fortunate person in Lord Roehampton, who is very pleasantly, we had almost said affectionately, sketched. That Lord Roehampton is Lord Palmerston in the main is, perhaps, the most positive "tip" that can be given to obtuse but curious persons. Yet Lord Palmerston certainly did not when he was middle-aged marry a penniless girl for love, nor did he die soon afterwards in the midst of his work. This, however, is a good instance of the embroilment (an embroilment quite justified, and indeed demanded, by all the laws of art) in which Lord Beaconsfield has involved his borrowings from the actual portrait gallery of history.

More elaborate even than Lord Roehampton—and, indeed, more elaborate than any other portraits in the book, hardly excepting Waldershare—are the sketches of Lord and Lady Montfort, though here, too, the strokes cross and mingle in an inextricable manner. Lady Montfort—Berengaria—is the queen of Whiggism; she holds the salon of the party, and very soon becomes the patroness, more active even than his sister, of Endymion. Her husband, whom she at least believes herself to adore, is a curious person who has travelled all over the world, who gave up his boroughs at the Reform Bill without any compensation, and who, having married Berengaria, allows her to play at queen of Whiggism as much as she likes, provided he is not expected to play king, much less prime minister. Besides Myra, Lady Rosehampton, and Lady Montfort, a third protectress appears for Endymion in the form of Imogene, his whilom landlady's pretty sister, with whom both he and Waldershare have in former days philandered, but who marries Lord Beaumaria. Under all these fostering influences Endymion's success is certain, especially as one at least of his patronesses does not hesitate to present him anonymously with 20,000*l.* when there is a difficulty about his getting into Parliament. His political adventures are not startling, and, indeed, he is rather the centre round whom the other characters move than a personage of considerable interest in himself. Of those personages we have not mentioned a twentieth part, and cannot by any possibility mention a quarter. Mr. Sidney Wilton, whose pseudonym is the most transparent, but whose character is perhaps the least interesting of all the political personages; Job Thornberry, the son of a farmer, who early develops Radical ideas, becomes a manufacturer in the north, gets into Parliament, speaks eloquently against the corn laws, and may now be found on most Cabinet Council days in Downing Street; Nigel Penruddocke, an enthusiastic disciple of the Tractarian movement, who follows his destiny and becomes Archbishop of Tyre and Papal Legate; Sir Fraunceys Scrope, the last man who appeared in the House in top-boots, a blue coat, and buff waistcoat,—these are among the most interesting and obviously familiar of the native characters. But foreigners play an important part. There is Prince Florestan, whose mother, Queen Agrippina, has the most beautiful hair in the world; who twice makes landings in the country to which he has claims, and the third time is, though in a very unhistoric way, successful; who lives much in England and figures in the Montfort tournament. There is the Count of Ferroll, who is something of a chronological puzzle, but whose references to blood and iron, and his characteristic statement that "a ministry which is upset by its finances must be essentially imbecile," sufficiently identify him. There are many other old friends with new faces, or new friends with old faces, as the reader may prefer to take it. We may give another extract or two, for few novelists are better represented by extracts than Lord Beaconsfield. The first is a striking sketch of pre-Reform notions in society; the second Nigel Penruddocke's vaticination as to the progress of free thought:—

"And how can the country be governed without the Church!" exclaimed Zenobia. "If the country once thinks the Church is in danger, the affair will soon be finished. The King ought to be told what is going on." "Nothing is going on," said the ambassador; "but everybody is afraid of something." "The King's friends should impress upon him never to lose sight of the landed interest," said the great personage. "How can any government go on without the support of the Church and the land?" exclaimed Zenobia. "It is quite unnatural." "That is the mystery," remarked the ambassador. "Here is a government, supported by none of the influences hitherto deemed indispensable, and yet it exists." "The newspapers support it," said the great personage, "and the Dissenters, who are trying to bring themselves into notice, and who are said to have some influence in the northern counties, and the Whigs, who are in a hole, are willing to seize the hand of the ministry to help them out of it; and then there is always a number of people who will support any government—and so the thing works." "They have got a new name for this hybrid sentiment," said the ambassador. "They call it public opinion." "How very absurd!" said Zenobia; "a mere nickname. As if there could be any opinion but that of the Sovereign and the two Houses of Parliament." "They are trying to introduce here the continental Liberalism," said the great personage. "Now we know what Liberalism means on the continent. It means the abolition of property and religion. Those ideas would not suit this country; and I often puzzle myself to foresee how they will attempt to apply Liberal opinions here." "I shall always think," said Zenobia, "that Lord Liverpool went much too far, though I never said so in his time; for I always uphold my friends."

"But let us be calm, my dear Nigel. Do you mean to say, that I am to be considered an infidel or an apostate because, although I fervently embrace all the vital truths of religion, and try, on the whole, to regulate my life by them, I may have scruples about believing, for example, in the personality of the Devil?" "If the personality of Satan be not a vital principle of your religion, I do not know what is. There is only one dogma higher. You think it is safe, and I dare say it is fashionable, to fall into this lax and really thoughtless discrimination between what is and what is not to be believed. It is not good taste to believe in the Devil. Give me a single argument against his personality which is not applicable to the personality of the Deity. Will you give that up; and if so, where are you? Now mark me; you and I are young men—you are a very young man. This is the year of grace 1839. If these loose thoughts, which you have heedlessly taken up, prevail in this country for a generation or so—five and twenty or thirty years—we may meet together again, and I shall have to convince you that there is a God."

Here is an extract from the remarks of the Father of the House:—

"It is very different from what it was when I was your age. Up to Easter we rarely had a regular debate, never a party division; very few people came up indeed. But there was a good deal of speaking on all subjects before dinner. We had the privilege then of speaking on the presentation of petitions at any length, and we seldom spoke on any other occasion. After Easter there was always at least one great party fight. This was a mighty affair, talked of for weeks before it came off, and then really an adjourned debate. We were gentlemen, used to sit up late, and should have been sitting up somewhere else had we not been in the House of Commons. After this party fight, the House for the rest of the session was a mere club. . . . Twenty years ago no man would think of coming down to the House except in evening dress. I remember so late as Mr. Canning, the minister always came down in silk stockings and pantaloons, or knee breeches. All things change, and quoting Virgil, as that young gentleman has just done, will be the next thing to disappear. In the last Parliament we often had Latin quotations, but never from a member with a new constituency. I have heard Greek quoted here, but that was long ago, and a great mistake. The House was quite alarmed. Charles Fox used to say as to quotation "No Greek; as much Latin as you like; and never French under any circumstances. No English poet unless he had completed his century." These were like some other good rules, the unwritten ordons of the House of Commons."

To criticise 'Endymion' as a whole is not the easiest of tasks, because it hardly presents itself as a whole. The book deals, so to speak, only with the prelude to the hero's own career, and closes as that career fully opens. Myra, too, is promoted from a coronet to a crown, but the reader has only a glimpse of her in her new dignity. The other characters are for the most part presented in profile, though the silhouettes are drawn with a firm and artful hand. As a story the book will probably be found disappointing; it does not much affect either the moving incident or the fantastic play of imagination, both of which the author could once manage so well. Vividly as the figures are for the moment brought before the reader, they come somewhat like shadows, and so they depart. But if the book has some drawbacks—and in particular Lord Beaconsfield has given himself but little room for the display of the brilliant, if not altogether chastened, faculty of description which he possesses—its merits are still remarkable. It is excellently written, and the author has never so fully proved himself able to produce quiet, graceful English prose. It is full of epigrammatic turns of thought and speech, less ostentatiously sparkling than of old, perhaps, but still of the old stamp, such as the allusion to the "transient and embarrassed phantom of Lord Goderich," and to "the costly ceremonies which under the names of Eton and Christchurch fascinated and dazzled mankind." There are not a few parades, as they may almost be called, of direct political and philosophical significance, such as that lately quoted in which Penruddocke discusses the future of faith, and that in which Enoch Craggs, the overlooker, points out that his master Job Thornberry's "thus far and no farther" of emancipation for capital, but not for labour, is not tempting to labourers themselves. In these things there is ample enjoyment to be found, and if any one wants more let him remember Dryden's happy story of the veteran cavalier, who, when apologising for not mounting his steed quite so nimbly as of yore, asked the spectators to count four score while he did it. But neither in the literal nor in the metaphorical sense need arithmetic go so far in the case of Lord Beaconsfield and 'Endymion.'

The Naval Brigade in South Africa during the Years 1877-78-79. By FLOET-SURGEON HENRY F. NORBURY, C.B. (Samson Low & Co.)

In this work Mr. Norbury gives a narrative of the operations of the Naval Brigade in the recent Kaffir and Zulu wars. That gallant force was so constantly employed in these contests, and under conditions of so novel a character, that no history of South Africa during the last three years could be regarded as complete which did not embrace many of the facts which Mr. Norbury has now placed upon record. The incidents described are, for the most part, not exciting, even though they include much skirmishing in the bush on the Cape frontier, and the memorable episode of the defence and relief of Ekowe. Moreover, Mr. Norbury does not wield a graphic pen, and therefore fails to do justice to his more eventful experiences. Besides recounting the achievements of the Naval Brigade, he furnishes an interesting, although discursive, account of the customs of the Kaffir tribes. He has collected much information concerning the witch doctors, who, in spite of the palpably fraudulent nature of their tricks, constantly manage to impose upon the credulity of the Kaffirs. At the same time he admits that they have acquired the knowledge of a few valuable drugs. "For instance," he says, "they have discovered with us the use of the male fern root, and they have various powerfully stimulant and aromatic barks," a statement which is fully confirmed by a recent writer of experience in Natal. The witch doctors play an important part in every native war. For instance, Gneto, Krel's medical attendant, as we suppose he may be called, sold three thousand war charms among the Galekas at the rate of about one shilling each. Mr. Norbury, in describing the extraordinary delusion which in the year 1856 cost the Kaffirs 20,000 lives and 200,000 head of cattle, says that it originated with Krel, who, in order to force the Kaffirs to fight, "prevailed on a witch doctor, Umhlakazi, to predict that should they destroy all their crops and cattle, their forefathers, with their departed cattle, would rise from the earth and drive the white race into the sea." It is certain that Umhlakazi played a mischievous part in this tragedy, but Mr. Browlee, the then Gaika Commissioner, states positively that the delusion was not in the first instance instigated by Krel, but was conceived in the brain of a young woman of the tribe, who, after the manner of some of the spiritual mediums of our own country and time, professed to speak under inspiration. Mr. Norbury says that "the Kaffirs are often very figurative in their idiom." This is quite true, and, indeed, he might have said that the Zulus are very rich in proverbs, many of them being both wise and humorous. Many of the bullocks employed in the war transport service were called "Inglemaun," a corruption of Englishmen, and Mr. Norbury remarks that animals bearing this name were popularly supposed to receive more flogging at the hands of their native drivers than any others in the span. This, we suspect, is a new version of the well-known story that the emigrant Boers were accustomed to give to their worst ox the name of "England" as an expression of their contempt for John Bull. The following incident is delightful in its way:—

"Some peaceably disposed Galekas once sent two bullocks to a company of our troops stationed near: one possessed a perfectly white body with a black head, to denote that it was a present from the black to the white man; the other was a red bullock with a white head, to indicate that it was sent to the white-faced men who wore red coats."

Most readers know that the Galeka war began in a beer-drinking quarrel between the Galekas and the Fingoes. On the authority of "many persons," Mr. Norbury suggests that the disturbance was premeditated on the part of Krel. As he does not mention his authority for this extraordinary statement, it is only fair to remark that it rests upon no better foundation than conjecture. Probably on better grounds he is convinced that the starving women who swarmed into our camp supplied information and food to the enemy, whereby the war was prolonged. His remedy for this state of things is hardly likely to be adopted by any English general. He says:—

"All the women of a tribe on the outbreak of a war should, on pain of death, be made to assemble in a certain part of the country, where they should be fed and placed under the surveillance of a strong guard, which should permit access to none."

It would, however, be unfair to judge Mr. Norbury by his abstract view of what would justify the infliction of capital punishment upon Kaffir women, for there is ample proof that he behaved with great humanity towards these poor creatures when they were found to be wounded or suffering from exhaustion. A Galeka woman, who is described as a "very intelligent-looking female," remarked to him that "they [the women] were never afraid to go to a white man's camp, it was the Fingoes they dreaded." Such a remark, confirming as it does all that has been rumoured concerning the brutal conduct of many of our Fingo allies, justifies a doubt as to whether in the beer-drinking quarrel the Galekas were really the aggressors. Mapassa, an influential Galeka chief, refused to take up arms against the English. His loyalty being suspected—although it would appear unjustly—he was required to leave the neighbourhood of the Kei. Mr. Norbury, in a matter-of-course way, says:—

"We burned all his kraals which were on our line of march to give him a hint to clear out and to convince him that we were in earnest."

This, no doubt, would greatly assist to confirm Mapassa in his loyalty. To what a depth of destitution the war reduced his people will be seen from the following extract:—

"We afterwards struck our tents to return to Itaka; whilst this was being done a number of Mapassa's people came into the camp to see what they could pick up. They were very badly off for food, and seized with avidity the mealies which the horses had left. One woman spoke intensely grammatical English; she seemed a respectable female, and had several children with her. She informed me that she belonged to Anta's people in the Ciskei, but that she had married a Galeka; that she had been educated at the seminary at Lovedale; that Mapassa's people were starving, and she longed for the war to be over, for she was quite certain that as the Xosa were beaten in every engagement they must succumb in the end, and that their continuing to fight was madness. All the family were very thin, and one of the daughters pinched up the skin over her stomach to signify how empty she was; so I procured a lot of spare biscuit and gave the mother, which she at once distributed."

Mr. Norbury was present when Sir Bartle Frere's ultimatum was handed to Cetywayo's messengers, and he frankly acknowledges that "the bearing of the Zulu Indunas was, on the whole, dignified, collected, and courteous, without the least exhibition of temper or bravado." He makes the remarkable statement, which we do not remember to have seen before, that the Indunas, in returning to Cetywayo, desired to be accompanied by a British representative in order that he might explain the grave demands which his Government had made upon the king. This request was not acceded to, but the duty of explaining the position of affairs was left to Mr. John Dunn, who, when he saw that war was impending, lost no time in quitting the la-of his adoption, and seeking a new location on the Natal side of the Tugela. Mr. Norbury says:—

"The procession reminded me strongly of the Biblical pictures of Abraham and the old patriarchs; there was Mr. Dunn, with his wives and concubines, his wild-looking men, armed with spears, driving forward the flocks and herds, his women and children, many hundreds in number, carrying their mats and cooking utensils on their heads, and the mothers with their little ones at their backs—a pastoral people migrating from one district to another."

As we have already remarked, an authentic account of the services which the Naval Brigade rendered in the two recent South African campaigns was well worth compiling, but Mr. Norbury would have shown more judgment if he had confined himself to that task, instead of introducing into his book topics which are not only highly controversial, but altogether foreign to his main object.

The Brothers Wiffen: Memoirs and Miscellanies.
Edited by S. R. Pattison. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

ALL those whose library, in their early days, included Mr. Howitt's charming 'Boy's Country Book' remember the name of Wiffen, and associate it with the delightful sketch there given of Ackworth School. The volume before us gives some account, with abundant specimens, of the poetical work not merely of J. H. Wiffen, the translator of Tasso, to whom the 'Boy's Country Book' notice refers, but of his brother Benjamin, who, long afterwards drifting into literary pursuits, won himself an honourable reputation among students of sixteenth century letters by his recovery and publication of many of the rarest works of the early Spanish reformers. The book contains lives of both brothers, in the case of J. H. Wiffen written by his daughter, in a style which perhaps too obviously emulates Mr. Carlyle in places; in the case of Benjamin by Mr. Pattison himself. The latter is the more interesting, because it includes long autobiographic extracts in which the book-hunts of the retired ironmonger (for such was Wiffen's unpoetical trade) are recounted with great simplicity and freshness.

Jeremiah Wiffen, the elder brother, was, though shortlived, rather a fortunate man in his way. The Wiffens were born and bred under the shadow of Woburn Abbey, and after a short period of trial as an usher the Duke of Bedford made Jeremiah his librarian, and thus secured to him a life of literary leisure. The editing of Rachel Lady Russell's letters and the 'Historical Memoirs of the House of Russell' were ample but not undue repayment. Wiffen married in 1828, and died suddenly in 1836 at the age of forty-four, after what appears to have been a singularly happy life. His brother shared his early literary enthusiasm, and some interesting particulars are here given of visits which they paid to Southey and Wordsworth during a tour to the Lakes. But Benjamin subsided into ironmongering, and it was not till long afterwards that he became actively engaged in literary pursuits of any kind, though he seems to have always kept up the habit of composing fugitive verse. Some time after his brother's death he retired from business, owing to ill health, and being then no more than forty-three he naturally wanted occupation. It was supplied to him in the odd way in which things are occasionally supplied at the right moment. His brother had been a Spanish as well as an Italian student, and had translated Garcilasso de la Vega as well as Tasso. Accordingly a Spaniard of rank and fortune who was interested in the early Spanish reformers, coming over to England with introductions to some prominent Quakers (to which body, as the mention of Ackworth has indeed sufficiently intimated, the Wiffens belonged), inquired after Jeremiah; he was referred to the surviving brother, then in London, and the result was a partnership of nearly thirty years in the exhumation and reproduction of the 'Reformistas Antiguos Españoles.' We have said that the autobiographic record of the progress of this work is perhaps the most interesting thing in this volume. Wiffen spent immense labour on his pursuit, usually copying out such unique or scarce works as he managed to get hold of and sending them to his friend Don Luis, who had them printed, though occasionally the printing was done in England. The bibliography of the subject being quite unstudied, and the books themselves (owing to persecution, and perhaps to the long interval of want of interest in them) very rare, the work was one of perpetual novelty and discovery; while in some instances, notably in the case of Juan Valdés, the intrinsic value of the matter recovered was not unworthy the labour spent on its recovery. Benjamin Wiffen died in 1867, at the age of seventy-three. Portraits of both brothers are given here—of the elder in his youth, Byronically handsome; of the younger apparently in late middle age, a thoughtful and somewhat severe face.

We have not as yet said anything about the "remains," which occupy a considerable space in the volume, and we shall own frankly that the biographical interest seems to exceed the literary. The poems here printed are frequently graceful enough, but they are distinctly minor poetry, and of that special class of minor poetry where the discerning reader can see that the writer was under the special influence, now of this author, now of that, and was, consciously or unconsciously, endeavouring to follow in the footsteps of one or the other. Jeremiah's poems are perhaps more finished and possess more deliberate attempt at poetic ornament; Benjamin's are more spontaneous, and perhaps testify to greater originality of mind. A good specimen of the former is to be found in the lines:—

O lady, wear this wreath for me,
Though gathered from the cypress tree.

Perhaps this equivoicalness, as it may be pardonably termed, was not a bad equipment for a translator, and we shall not attempt to determine whether after Fairfax and Hoole, a curious enough pair, a third translator of Tasso was wanted. Benjamin's poems consist of two of some length: 'The Quaker Squire,' deriving partly from Cowper and partly from Crabbe, and 'The Warder of the Pyrenees,' less definitely suggested by Scott. In 'The Quaker Squire' there are passages of very decided merit. Something not dissimilar may be said of his few minor poems, though his command of lyric metres was by no means equal to his brother's. To both, however, if the title of poet must be grudged them, that of man of letters can be unhesitatingly granted. The Quakers have always been honourably distinguished among Nonconformist sects by their contributions to literature, and the two Wiffens bore a worthy part in sustaining this reputation.

Tasmanian Friends and Foes, Feathered, Furred, and Finned: a Family Chronicle of Country Life, Natural History, and Veritable Adventure. By Louisa Anne Meredith. (Marcus Ward & Co.)

THIS is a very excellent book for children, and many older folk will find much to interest them in it. This is high praise, but there is that in the book which makes us wish that we could praise it yet more highly. Its great fault is that it is woven of three inartistically blended threads of interest.

It is well known how great is the tendency in settlers to surround themselves with the birds and animals natural to their new home. The dwelling and enclosure of the colonist more often than not form a menagerie in which the animals are allowed to roam almost at will, thus affording splendid opportunities for study of their habits. During nearly forty years spent in Tasmania Mrs. Meredith has availed herself to the utmost of the facilities she enjoyed. Moreover, she has evidently loved and studied not only her own pets, but also all living things with which she has met. "Careful scientific descriptions of all these creatures," she says, "have been written by learned naturalists for learned people; the only ground on which there is room for our pens is the familiar every-day knowledge of little habits and peculiarities which the greatest professors at home cannot always observe for themselves." Accordingly in the present book she has recorded innumerable personal experiences of the animals and plants of Tasmania in a way that is sure to interest intelligent children, and if not scientifically, yet with such evident truthfulness and detail as to compel the attention of naturalists. She herself writes:—"I do not presume to offer scientific information on any subject, but have given the proper (i.e. scientific) names of most objects alluded to, so that works of authority may readily be consulted by the inquiring or studious reader." These experiences form the chief attraction of the volume.

If the above were a full description the book would be much better than it is. Unfortunately the author has chosen to mingle her facts with a slight and uninteresting thread of fiction. She presents the experiences which she has to offer not as her own—though she says in her preface, and we fully believe, that they are her own—but as those of the family of Tasmanian settlers which supplies the chief characters in her fiction. The name of this family is Merton; and its members are in the habit of indulging in conversation so didactic, and of stringing together such leading questions, that, though he is not so told, the reader feels sure that they have some connexions of the name of Sandford. Mrs. Meredith's information is administered as a wholesome medicine—in very insipid jam. This may be well enough for some children; but for others, and for all older readers, the medicine would have been more welcome without the jam. In short, the fiction both obscures the fact and makes it distasteful.

But the difficulty which the reader feels in precisely distinguishing the facts is infinitely increased by the knowledge, acquired from the preface, that the characters in the fiction are, with some exceptions, real. It would have been better if the author had simply recorded what she has to say; or, if she must have fiction, that she had allowed us to believe that her fictitious characters were fictitious. As it is, the reader's attention is constantly distracted by the endeavour to understand the circumstances under which facts very valuable to the naturalist really happened.

Another point of interest in the book is, it may be suspected, from the publishers' point of view, the chief reason for its existence. It is illustrated by certain coloured plates of insects, flowers, and fishes from drawings by the author. These are pretty, and will without doubt please many child readers. Some of the figures of fishes are valuable if they are as accurate as they appear, but it would be necessary to see the fish while as fresh as when drawn by the artist to confirm this. There are also certain black-and-white sketches of animals which, we confess, please us more than the coloured plates. The sketch of "Dumpy the Wombat" is really charming. But it is now time that we should turn from the fiction and the illustrations to the stories of animal life which form the most valuable part of the volume.

That the indigenous animals of Tasmania are fast disappearing is a well-known fact, but none the less it is sad to hear from so good an authority as Mrs. Meredith that the mischief has gone so far. Scarcely an animal is mentioned by her without the addition of the remark that "it is now never seen," or at least that "it is now much more seldom seen than formerly." It is rather strange that while she laments the extermination of nearly every other animal, she writes almost with satisfaction of the disappearance of the natives of Tasmania. Her testimony differs from that commonly received in that she attributes the blame for the extermination of the natives to themselves, and not to the white settlers. The blacks, she intimates, began to murder the whites, and only after that did the whites retaliate by exterminating the blacks. Yet she herself says that the blacks did not become ferocious till some time after the arrival of the whites; and a story which she tells of the risk which some native women ran, through gratitude, to save the lives of a party of settlers, shows that, long after strife between the two colours had broken out, Tasmanians were at least capable of feelings not entirely degraded.

Some of the anecdotes of animal instinct are most curious, and bear the stamp of truth. Regarding the intelligence of marsupials, which is usually considered to be not great, she writes:—

"Whilst regretting that so unjustifiable an opinion should be held by men of science, I am tain to rejoice over those pages in my unpretending book which I think will supply evidence that the engaging and affectionate animals whose brief memoirs they contain are far from deficient in intelligence. . . . The young brush kangaroo, of which the longest account is given, showed most decided knowledge of, and preference for, certain individuals. In the morning, before his breakfast of bread-and-milk was given to him, he would follow me or the parlour-maid from place to place until we fed him; but he only so followed us because no one else was in the habit of feeding him at that hour. In the garden he hopped round and round in merry races with our sons, seeming as fond of the fun as they were, or with his little fore-paws took hold of my husband's hands or mine, licking them fondly, and evidently liking to pace the walks with us in our sedate manner; but at the sound of an opening gate he would quickly and warily rear himself erect and glance round, with his ever alert and mobile ears intently listening, and should an unfamiliar step approach, he invariably took flight, leaping away at railway speed to hide himself among the shrubs. Here, surely, was evidence of clear discrimination. My tame bandicoots, which used to run up like great mice into the folds of my dress, or creep into my sleeves, never attempted such familiarities with any other person; and the one which died would cry uneasily if any hands but my own touched it after it became sick. A great forest kangaroo, which long ago belonged to the wife of one of Mr. Meredith's servants, always accompanied her everywhere, as a faithful dog would do, but never followed any one else; and the wombat attaches itself to particular persons with touching fidelity."

There are two stories which we should especially like to quote, but want of space compels us to condense the words in which Mrs. Meredith tells them. The first concerns a kid and a lamb, which, being brought up together as house pets, became inseparable, and so continued until they were about fourteen months old. The sheep was then taken away for an hour to be shorn, the goat being much disturbed during the absence of her friend. When the sheep returned without his coat the goat turned on him furiously,

"buted him off as an impertinent interloper, and still went on running from place to place, seeking anxiously for her lost sheep, ever and anon turning round to butt poor Billy, who ran after her in answer to the well-known call, only to meet the cruellest repulse and insult. Nor could all our endeavours effect a reconciliation. The Billy of Nanny's affection was gone—lost to her for ever with his woolly coat; and she evidently believed that the shorn sheep, so patiently trotting after her, was a total stranger."

After a fortnight spent in this way, the goat refusing to recognize her old companion, and pining because of her supposed loss, the sheep was still so miserable that he was sent away to find companions of his own kind. Mrs. Meredith adds that the goat was never puzzled by any alterations, however great, in the clothing of her human friends.

The second story relates how a pair of carriage horses, noted during many years for their mutual affection, one day suddenly quarrelled for no assignable cause, and, after fighting viciously with heels and teeth, separated; nor did they ever renew their old kindly relations.

Finally, we notice a few misprints in the book, especially in the scientific names. For example, "tetrads-copalis" and "papilis" are odd forms; and "Bruchi Zema Jervis"

Jamesonii," as the name of one bird, is still more odd. Moreover, the reader is referred on p. 40 to an appendix, which is nowhere to be found. The publishers have prefixed a note to the book in which they bespeak indulgence for such mistakes, on the plea that the author is in Tasmania.

Our Pets and Playfellows. By Gertrude Patmore. (Bell & Sons.)

'FAMILY HONOUR' is a rather pointless story, except so far as it may be supposed to enforce a moral against false pride. An impossible sort of old lady conceals the misalliance of a brother, who on his deathbed entrusted her with the duty of taking care of his orphan children. Her pride takes the form of providing for them at a distance and under a false name. A general confusion of relations takes place, in spite of her efforts, in the Austwick family, and the proud old lady commits suicide. There seems nothing in the story that can possibly commend it to youth.

Miss Ridley's "story for girls" is of a wholesome sort, and shows some knowledge of girlish character. The gradual improvement in the temper of poor Beatrice, a high-spirited girl who by an accident is reduced to blindness, is the leading subject of the story; but Rose, May, Madge, &c., all contribute to the general interest.

"Sator's" story is an alliterative homily on patience, perseverance, prudence, and the like, diversified by the broken English of an infant and the provincial accent of a north-country nurse, both more laboured than effective. In spite of its merits, the book is heavily handicapped by such occasional lapses into imbecility as children are the first to resent.

'Panna's Flour-bin' is an imitation, at a distance, of 'Alice in Wonderland.' A little girl dreams of fairyland, in which key-boys and thimble-girls, flour-bins and toadstools, get mixed in dreamy fashion. The manner of the tale is happy enough, and occasionally there seems to be a thought, or a half-thought, of a wholesome kind.

'Frank Powderhorn' is a cheerful story, and that part which relates to a sheep-farmer's life in Buenos Ayres and the Fauna and other peculiarities of that country is interesting to older readers than those to whom the Patagonian adventures and the experiences on shipboard will appeal. The rather farcical sketch of the old lieutenant and his friends is not unamusing.

Some of the sentimental autobiographies of the beasts in "the Zoo" are not bad, though we doubt the value, for instance, of the tale of the martens, and think the frontispiece an ugly exception to the other illustrations.

Mr. Kingston's tale of warfare and hunting carries the reader to the Southern States of America at a period when the Red Indian was still in the land. The adventures of the Irish hero, and those of his friend and countryman Rochford, who arrives in Florida with an enthusiasm for the aborigines, will be read with zest by young lovers of adventure, who will not criticize too closely the verisimilitude of the tale.

In 'Roger Willoughby' the author, whom we are sorry to have to call the late Mr. Kingston, deals not only with some stirring sea fights of old Admiral Benbow, but also with Monmouth's rebellion, the Bloody Assize, &c., and so far lends himself to the purpose of combining instruction with amusement. His modest hope that the book may be found not less interesting than its predecessors has certainly been realized.

Mr. Langbridge's book is well written, and it is no doubt desirable that well-cared-for children out of the nursery should be acquainted to some extent with the harder lot of their contemporaries among the poor. A story dealing with life in a squalid court in a city, with drunkenness, misery, and crime, is not to be lightly put into the hands of youth; but when they are of an age to be edified, and not merely terrified, by the knowledge of such horrors, they cannot make acquaintance with them through a better medium than Mr. Langbridge provides; and, after all, Joe and Heather have the good fortune to come happily through their troubles.

'Every Boy's Annual' is, as usual, excellently adapted to the readers for whom it is designed. For instance, Mr. Frith's "Ascents and Adventures" are sure to interest boys. A little more attention might be bestowed with advantage on the woodcuts; there are a great number of them, some good, but many bad.

'Elfin Hollow' will be deservedly popular among young children who are at the stage at which good thoughts are most easily inculcated by means of good pictures and good stories. The adventures of Ragged Robin in the country of the Gnomes, the Happy Dogs, &c., are simply and prettily told, and bear with them an excellent moral. The illustrations are particularly good.

The travels of Count Funnibos and his friend are also prettily illustrated, though the pictures are occasionally grotesque, which seems a mistake. Surely the slang and sordid side of life will make its impression soon enough. The story is but slight, and is simply a vehicle for the geography of Holland, a country of which English children perhaps know less than they should.

Hassan is a pariah dog who tells, from the canine point of view, his adventures in Bulgaria during the horrors of the late war. The worst features of the time are but slightly glanced at, but enough is told to give a sufficiently graphic sketch for youthful readers of that terrible winter.

Nimpo is an American young lady aged thirteen, who, with her younger brothers, is sent out "to board" with a rough-tongued lodging-house keeper during her parents' absence from home. Her troubles arise from the contrast between the grandeur of independence which she promises herself and the coarse living and rough discipline of Mrs. Primkins. The story presents a curious picture of American life, but the scrapes into which the children get, their joys and sorrows, are in no way very remarkable. We doubt the tale being very attractive to English children.

'Beatrice Melton's Discipline' is a religious tal. The heroine, an Australian schoolmistress, undergoes several severe trials, the result of which, and of a happy marriage, is to confirm her piety. The book is written in an excellent spirit, but as a story is not specially interesting.

Miss Patmore has recorded in the simplest style a number of interesting anecdotes of her dumb favourites, which will be read with great zest by children, and contain curious facts for boy naturalists. The battle between the frog and beetle is an extraordinary affair, which one could hardly believe on less respectable testimony.

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

History of Scotland for Schools. By W. F. Collier, LL.D. (Ibister.)

SCOTCH history, taken seriously, is perhaps rather difficult to make either clear or interesting. It must be confessed that Dr. Collier, if he intended to fascinate his youthful readers, is hardly likely to succeed. Even Scotch boys—we assume that English boys are out of the question—will have to be unusually patriotic or unusually industrious if they are to take much interest in history treated as it is in this little book. It is for the most part a dry narrative of events in chronological order. Considerable attention is given to the earlier mediæval times, and four-fifths of the work are occupied with the history of Scotland before the union of the crowns. So appalling is the list of State crimes before that date, that the student is likely to fancy he is reading a Newgate Calendar on a gigantic scale. "Henceforth," as Dr. Collier says, "the turbulent stream of Scottish history, too often running red with blood, joins the broader current of English story." It is perhaps a pity that the more peaceful but not less interesting times after 1603 have not received an attention proportionate to their importance. The arrangement of the book has nothing modern about it. Generally speaking, each reign has a chapter to itself, and the longer periods are made to depend on the duration of a dynasty. There are no descriptive titles to mark the characteristics of an epoch, nor is sufficient prominence given to the leading events on which the attention of the student should be fixed. Mythical or romantic stories are mingled with more solid facts in order to give colour to the picture, but we may be allowed to suggest that selections from 'Tales of my Grandfather' and an abstract of Burton form a somewhat incongruous mixture. The illustrations are obviously intended, like the stories, to make the book more palatable. The sketches of famous localities, such as Iona and Stirling Castle, are excellent in their way, and increase the value of the work. Other cuts, of more or less antiquarian interest, are scattered about, often à propos de rien, and the book would not have suffered much by their omission. The unwilling student will hardly be beguiled by such sops to his curiosity. A concession is made to modern prejudice by the insertion of short chapters on social matters at proper intervals, but the reader will look in vain for any account of constitutional affairs. He might almost remain in ignorance that such a thing as a Scotch Parliament had existed. No allusion is made to its origin and growth, or to the changes by which its authority was practically annihilated under James I. and Charles I. Although the narrative is generally correct, it is here and there somewhat loose in statement. The remark, for instance, on p. 20, that "up to the ninth century Scotch or Scotland meant Ireland," is, to say the least, misleading. We also notice some important omissions. Edward I.'s claim to the Scotch throne is left unexplained in its proper place, and the basis on which it rested are alluded to elsewhere as doubtful statements. We should have thought that, whatever may be said of the claim, the homage to Edward the elder and the grant of Cumberland to Malcolm were tolerably well-authenticated facts. On many other points of interest, such as the weakness of the government under the earlier Stuarts and the connexion between Scotland and France, the inquiring student meets with insufficient explanation. The account of the Union, however, is fairly good. The style in which the book is written is unadorned but respectable. Such sentences as the following, on p. 34, "The rock of which it [the stone of Scone] consists belongs to the geology of Western Scotland," are fortunately rare. It should be observed that though the position of important places is explained in notes at the end of the chapters, there is only one very meagre map. We could have dispensed with most of the illustrations for the sake of a good map or two and some plans of the principal battle-fields. There are, on the other hand, plenty of genealogical tables, with biographical notices and other apparatus likely to prove useful to any one who is unfortunate enough to be "gramming" for an examination.

Elementary Classics: P. Vergili Maronis Georgicon, Liber Secundus. Edited for the Use of Schools by the Rev. J. H. Skrine. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE main features of this edition are the introduction on the motive of the 'Georgics' and the English headings which give the drift of the divisions of the subject. The notes are sensible. One mistake we notice, namely, the explanation of a dativus terminus (l. 41) as a dativus commodi. We are glad to see sundry happy illustrations from English poets in the notes. It is to be hoped that future editors of classical works will follow so good an example. Those who consider the 'Georgics' to be "Elementary Classics" and only want the second book will do well to avail themselves of Mr. Skrine's assistance.

Xenophontis Memorabilia Socratis. Edited with Introduction and Notes by A. R. Cluer, B.A. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS is more than a mere school-book. It far surpasses in every respect all other English editions of the 'Memorabilia.' Mr. Cluer shows an intimate acquaintance with the voluminous literature of the Socratic philosophy. The notes evince considerable scholarship. There are a marginal analysis and indexes, and five excellent introductory essays including the preface. We can strongly recommend the work to students and teachers.

Via Latina. By E. A. Abbott, D.D. (Seeley, Jackson & Halliday.)

IN spite of the multitude of similar works already in existence, a new "First Latin Book" by so distinguished a schoolmaster as Dr. Abbott will excite much attention. The author states in a short preface the nature of the want which he has tried to supply. He does not pretend that other primers are bad, or that his own contains anything substantially new, but he complains that pupils are too generally allowed to learn accidence without using it and by use understanding the purpose of indexes: "The Latin sentences placed before beginners are so easy that a pupil soon finds he can construe without the trouble of parsing; and he thus early contracts the fatal habit of 'plunging' at the meaning instead of reasoning it out. To provide against this evil is one of the principal objects of the 'Via Latina.'" For this purpose, on Dr. Abbott's plan, accidence should be learned in small doses and applied at once, in as many ways as possible, to construing and composing. The chapter on the first declension will show more clearly than any other the method of this 'Via Latina.' The pupil, presumably ignorant of Latin, is first taught a few nouns of the first declension and a few finite verbs with their meanings. The ordinary functions of the cases are then explained and illustrated, and the declension of nouns in the singular follows. The first exercise is on the parsing of single words, with translation from Latin and English. The second exercise is much more difficult. The pupil is required to translate such sentences as "Femine patientia nautes violentum superat" and "The daughter gives the queen's money to the sailor," and every Latin noun is to be carefully parsed. It is obvious that the stupidest boy cannot leave these two exercises without a very clear notion of the use of the cases generally and a thorough knowledge of that small part of Latin accidence which he has at present had occasion to learn. The subsequent lessons and exercises are all constructed in a similar manner, and require no further quotation. It will be seen that the exercises are at first more difficult than those of most Latin primers, but the author manages with great adroitness to avoid anticipating information and explanations that should more properly come later on in the book, and yet to accustom his pupils from the first to the belief that it is possible to talk sense in the Latin language. Hints on style are frequently introduced and exemplified, and copious vocabularies and other appendices are supplied. The materials employed are, of course, precisely the same as those of other books of the class and the lessons are arranged in precisely the same order, except that the simpler uses of the subjunctive are taught rather earlier than is customary; but the merit of Dr. Abbott's book is that his exercises are so nicely adjusted to the facts supplied and the explanations given that with its help it would seem impossible to teach Latin badly.

Homer's Iliad, Book XXI. By Arthur Sidgwick, M.A. (Rivington.)

White's Grammar School Texts: Xenophon's Anabasis, Book IV. With a Vocabulary.—Homer's Odyssey, Book I. With a Vocabulary and some Account of Greek Prosody. By John T. White, D.D. (Longmans & Co.)

THE vocabularies are well prepared excepting as to some of the etymology, which is not always sound, and refers too much to Sanskrit. The contents of each chapter of Xenophon are given in headings. The Homeric Prosody should prove most useful.

Selections from Caesar: The Gallic War. By G. L. Bennett, M.A. (Rivington.)

MR. BENNETT'S aim has been to "select a number of chapters sufficient to give an idea of the whole of Caesar's government of Gaul." He supplies a short sketch of Caesar's life, a neat map of Gaul, short, sensible notes, and a biographical and geographical index. The type is good.

"Unseen Papers" in Latin Prose and Verse, with Examination Questions. By T. Collins, M.A. (Bell & Sons.)

THESE selections are easy, being meant for the use of candidates for the Cambridge Local Examinations. The book is offered to "brother masters," therefore references should have been given. Mr. Collins's labours will be appreciated.

A First Greek Writer, with Exercises and Vocabularies. By A. Sidgwick, M.A. (Rivington.)

THIS excellent little book is intended partly to "serve as a first stage to Mr. Sidgwick's 'Introduction to Greek Prose Composition.'" The exercises are progressive. As in the more advanced work, they consist of amusing narratives. If it is worthy of Mr. Sidgwick's position and reputation to spend his time on such elementary work, it is owing to the extremely thorough and judicious way in which he does it.

A Primer of Greek Grammar: Syntax. By E. D. Mansfield, M.A. (Rivington.)

IT is hard to compile an easy syntax without enunciating paradoxes. A boy would be puzzled at the notion that "him" in "I left him" was an accusative of "motion to." If "void of sense" gives us a genitive of separation, what are we to make of "full of nonsense," a common case which Mr. Mansfield seems to have neglected? According to him following actual contact. It is impossible to say that Mr. Mansfield has been very successful in dealing with the difficulties of his task. He should study Mr. Sidgwick's works on Greek prose composition.

Elementary Classics: Extracts from the Greek Menæce Poets, from Callinus to Callimachus; to which are added a few Epigrams. Selected and Edited for the Use of Schools by Herbert Kynaston, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.)

This capital selection supplies an obvious need, and should be used in all schools where Greek is taught, and by senior students who cannot afford complete editions of the poets in question.

An Elementary Treatise on Geometrical Drawing. By the Rev. J. H. Robson, M.A. (Relfe Brothers.)

In the military examinations the obligatory subject of geometrical drawing is, in reality, the one most readily learned; yet examiners generally find that it is the one least perfectly comprehended by the competing students, because it cannot be crammed. The manual before us contains easy and concise methods of working out simple examples of geometry, such as are ordinarily found in the papers set in the preliminary examinations for entrance to Woolwich and Sandhurst. The directions for the construction of plain and comparative scales are clear and simple; and altogether this small publication is suited for the class-rooms of army schools.

An Introduction to Logic. By W. H. S. Monck, M.A. (Dublin, Hodges, Foster & Figgis; London, Longmans & Co.)

We are sorry to be unable to speak of this work as a whole in the same terms of praise that some parts of it, or rather some remarks in it, deserve. It would be better used, not by beginners as an introduction to logic, but by more advanced students as a book in which they may find here and there a useful criticism or suggestion. For an instance of such, the writer insists often, and very usefully at the present time, on the essentially separate characters of logic and mathematics. In logic, as he points out (p. 30), terms are used as a rule distributively, whereas in algebra they are used collectively. Thus, "All armies—all soldiers" is a correct algebraic equation, but as no army is a soldier, such a proposition is inadmissible in logic. And again, the logical terms "all" and "some," unlike the algebraic symbols x , y , z , are seldom numerically definite quantities. But against two or three useful remarks such as this we have to set faults which, in our judgment, take greatly from the value of the book. To pass over faults of general conception—e.g. the limitation of logic to deduction, i.e. to what the writer calls conclusive and indisputable inference, with its implied assumption that by deduction it is possible to extract from the major premises furnished by induction conclusions of greater certainty than induction gives to the major premises, in other words, that induction and deduction admit of being opposed in respect of the certainty they give, whether such certainty be hypothetical or real—to pass over this fundamental misconception and all that follows from it, we have faults of what one is tempted to call positive ignorance. The "few words as to the history of the science of logic" which close the preface have in more than one point a very odd look, and the writer would have done better to omit them. But our suspicions become graver when in the body of the work it is stated that Aristotle's categories "seem to have been founded on the parts of speech which were recognized by the grammarians of the day." A few words more, naming the parts of speech recognized by "the grammarians of the day" and showing their connexion with the categories, would establish Mr. Monck's claim to have made a real contribution to the history of logic, and one which, by its definiteness, would supersede at once the halting and tentative suggestion of Trendelenburg as to the origin of the categories. Grammarians, too, who have hitherto believed that the parts of speech were founded on the categories, in later days than those of Aristotle, will likewise be pleased if the statement above quoted can be made good. Of equal value with the above is the statement that Aristotle's first division of the categories "should have been" into substances and accidents, or attributes, and it is not surprising to find Mr. Monck repeating Mill's criticism on the category $\pi\acute{o}\tau\epsilon\iota$, relative terms, as if relative terms and relations were the same things. And the criticism of Aristotle's account of the head of predicables, property, and the account of Porphyry's heads of predicables leave the reader wondering where the writer has picked up his knowledge of ancient logic, and why he has thought proper to print what will be of so little value to any one, whether acquainted with the history of logic or not.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

THE readers and admirers of the late Mortimer Collins will probably themselves have noted not a few of the epigrammatic sayings thrown together by Mr. Kenslake in a convenient volume called Attic Salt. If in some cases sentences have been admitted which scarcely fulfil the requirements of an epigram, and others which are merely rearrangements of some favourite idea, in the main a wise discretion has been exercised by the compiler, and the collection is fairly representative of the best thoughts of one who thought well. His humour was not altogether in unison with popular taste; in politics and religion his wit did not "keep the road-way"; but we do not envy the man, however differing in opinion, who can rise from a perusal of this little book without increased respect for the late author and a more genial feeling to humanity. It were needless to quote sentences which have often been quoted in this journal. One is "Youth is a lyric, manhood an epic, age a philosophy." Collins was perhaps more a lyricist than a philosopher, but the youthful spirit he maintained till his prime is tempered by much insight into matters of profoundest interest. The publishers of this volume are Messrs. Robson & Co.

THE Nuova Rivista Internazionale has adopted a new plan of publishing some of its articles in a separate form under the title of "Biblioteca della Nuova Rivista Internazionale." The first number of that series, just published, contains a translation of Prof. Max Müller's address 'On Freedom,' delivered at Birmingham in 1878. The title is Della Libertà Individuale, Discorso di Max Müller, Firenze, 1880.

MESSRS. BARNES & SON send us their Daily Calendar and their Scripture Calendar. The former is excellent, but we strongly object to the latter. The same firm send us a neat Monthly Diary.

MESSRS. FIELD & TURN send us the first volume of the Printers' International Specimen Exchange, an attempt to raise the standard of printing by putting together samples of work contributed by various printers in the United Kingdom and America. The undertaking has been blessed by Mr. Ruskin, who says: "I have the most entire sympathy with your objects, but believe that people will have had paper nowadays, bad printing nowadays, and bad painting nowadays—and nothing else." Some of the specimens given here are very bad, while others are excellent. The examples of "old style" printing supplied by the publishers of the book are all of them good. Mr. Caddell, of Gravesend, sends some neat "Japanesque" ornaments; and a circular executed by Messrs. Peddie, of Edinburgh, is tasteful.

MESSRS. DE LA RUE have sent us an assortment of Christmas Cards, which it is almost needless to say are gorgeous specimens of their class. Some of them are exceedingly good. The comic cards are the least happy.—We have also before us four tasteful Floral Cards by Mrs. Duffield, which are accompanied by indifferent verses.

WE have on our table Memoirs of Field-Marshal the Duke de Saldanha, 2 vols., by the Conde de Carnota (Murray).—Great Orators: Burke, Fox, Sheridan, Pitt, by H. J. Nicoll (Edinburgh, Macniven & Wallace).—How to Manage a Steam-Engine, by M. P. Hale (Wyman & Sons).—Electric Lighting: a Lecture, by J. W. Swan (Newcastle-on-Tyne, Lawson & Co.).—The Obelisk and Freemasonry, by J. A. Wisme (Dulan & Co.).—Discontent and Danger in India, by A. K. Connell (Kegan Paul).—Pictures from Ireland, by T. McGrath (Kegan Paul).—Autobiography of an Italian Police Officer (Maxwell).—Asgard and the Gods, edited by W. S. W. Anson (Sonnenschein & Allen).—The Two Miss Duncans, by the Author of 'The Balmie' (Hodder & Stoughton).—Rose-Leaves, by A. Alberg (Sonnenschein & Allen).—Dod's Story Book (Casell).—Nehemiah Nibb's Goose, by G. W. Bardsley ('Hand and Heart' Office).—Life Chords, by Frances Ridley Havergal (Nisbet).—The Storm of the 30th of January, 1849, and the 29th of May, 1860, Told in Rhyme (J. T. Hayes).—The Prince of Life, arranged by H. Twells (Clowes).—The Churchman's Life of Wesley, by R. D. Urrill (S.P.C.K.).—Sketches of the Women of Christendom (S.P.C.K.).—The Churches of Asia, by W. Cunningham (Macmillan).—Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, by M. Dods (Edinburgh, Macniven & Wallace).—Treasure-Book of Consolation, edited by B. Orme (Marshall, Japp & Co.).—Elementary Lessons on the Old Testament, by Emily E. Deedes (O.E.S.S.I.).—Guillaume de Tyr et ses Contemporains, by M. P. Paris (Firmindidot & Co.).—and Fische, Fucherei, und Fischzucht in Ost- und Westpreussen, Part I., by Dr. B. Banerke (Königsberg, Hartung). Among New Editions we have Peasant Life in the West of England, by F. G. Heath (Low).—A Book about Roses, by S. R. Hole (Blackwood).—The Gospels, arranged by the Rev. E. Fowle (Relfe Brothers).—and Learning: Minna von Barnhelm, by J. A. F. Schmidt (Williams & Norgate). Also the following Pamphlets: Our Land Laws of the Past, by the Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, M.P. (Casell).—The Ground Game Act, 1880, by G. Grant (Land Agent's Record Office).—Insanity: its Treatment and Prevention, by J. A. Campbell (Carlsle, Thurnam & Sons).—and National Association for the Protection of the Insane and Prevention of Insanity (Boston, U.S., Tolman & White).

SHAKESPEARE NOTES.

31, Matthäikirch Strasse, Berlin.

THE "wondrous strange snow" in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' V. i. 58 & seq.,— Merry and tragical! tedious and brief!

That is hot ice and wondrous strange snow, haunts even to-day the emendational conscience of the editors; it has not yet come to rest, perhaps, because the error was always looked for in the word "strange," and only there. Is not "wondrous" a very weak expression, and would not "ponderous" be much more to the purpose? The contrast between heat and ice is not more striking than that between ponderousness and a gliding down flake of snow; and so I may ask you what you think about "ponderous flakes of snow" instead of "wondrous strange snow." A shorthand writer with a weak mind and a weak organ of hearing might easily have understood and written something about a "wondrous strange snow," while what the actor said was quite in keeping with the situation, namely, hot ice and heavy snow.

Concerning the "strange black," "swarthy," "staining," and "sable" snow, the question is to be put whether in Shakespeare's London the fogs were even but half as dirty as they are to-day; if this question is to be answered in the affirmative, Shakespeare could not have found any "wonder" in the fact of snow being dirty.

For Shakespeare's use of "ponderous" in the sense of "heavy" see 'Measure for Measure,' III. ii. 290, 'Hamlet,' I. iv. 50; concerning "flakes," see 'Lear,' IV. vii. 30.

'Midsummer Night's Dream,' III. ii. 149 f:—

Can you not hate me as I know you do

But must you join in souls to mock me too?

The proposed emendations for "in souls" are: "in flouts," "in souls," "ill souls," "but must join insolent," "in taunts." I propose the reading "insults": "Are you not contented with hating me, but must you join insults to the hate by mocking me?" I know that Shakespeare has not used the same word, but we find its different forms several times, and are allowed to understand it there, at least in a few passages, in the sense here required. F. A. Leo.

THE DANISH PASSIONAL.

11, King William Street, West Strand, Nov. 17, 1880.

My attention has just been called to the Latin 'Passionale' included in Luther's 'Enchiridion' as being the original of the Danish version; and I readily acknowledge that it had, for the time, escaped my memory, although the work itself repeatedly occurs in my catalogues. There are, however, certain differences betwixt them, which I venture to think leave my general inference untouched.

For example, in the preface the last paragraph of the Danish—"Therefore we ought to pray to God that he might soften every man's heart, and give us grace that we may fruitfully consider the death and pains of Jesus Christ. For it is not possible that we ourselves can properly and thoroughly consider the death and pains of Jesus Christ without so be that God gives us that gift in our hearts. So there neither is this consideration nor any other teaching given these for this cause, that thou shouldst at once take to it, and think that thou of thyself canst carry it out. But thou must seek and covet the grace of God, that thou mayest through his grace, and not of thyself, perfect it,"—is not in the Latin.

Again, although the number of the illustrations agree, for that, in the Latin, of the raising of Lazarus, the Danish substitutes our Lord before Herod; and that of David, which concludes the Danish, is not in the Latin. But of more importance still, the prayers, which in the Danish accompany each subject, are entirely absent in the Latin. C. J. STEWART.

THE BIOGRAPHERS OF LOCKE.

PROF. FOWLER has convicted me of a very stupid blunder, but in doing so has himself shown carelessness which I think reasonable critics will regard as a set-off to my offence. In the sentence that he quotes from my translation of one of Locke's letters to Limborch I presume that he objects especially to my having rendered the phrase, "Tu et tui similes veri et sine ambitione vel invidia christiani," as "You and true men like you, free from Christian arrogance and hatred," whereas it should have been "You and men like you, true Christians, free from arrogance and hatred" (or, if Mr. Fowler prefers it, "without ambition or envy"). I can only account for the blunder by attributing it to some confusion in working up my notes, which were made at wide intervals, and often several times reshaped before my book was actually written. I do not ask to be excused for the blunder, but I trust less censorious persons than Mr. Fowler will not attribute it to ignorance of "the rudiments of a classical education"; especially as in copying this very phrase Mr. Fowler has shown that it is possible to make a mistake without being grossly ignorant. In transcribing Locke's sentence he has omitted the words "vel invidia." I am quite sure that he did this through mere carelessness; but I should have as good a right to charge him with maliciously falsifying a quotation, in order to lead the reader to suspect me of a worse fault than I have committed, as he has to imply that I do not know the difference between an ablative singular and a nominative plural.

I am as anxious as Prof. Fowler can be to bring this controversy to a close, and shall therefore say nothing that can tempt him to break his rule of silence, although by taking no notice of several details in his last letter I leave him with the advantage of having diverted attention from the broad question between us by raising a number of side issues. But I must indignantly repudiate his assumption that I have made any "slandorous assertion for the mere purpose of annoyance," and I must also repudiate his other assumption, that my complaint against him was prompted by any fear (which I never had) that the publication of his book would damage the sale of mine. It was not a question of money, but of literary reputation; and, rightly or wrongly, I felt, and still feel, that Mr. Fowler has not treated me well in writing a book about Locke which made so slight a "general acknowledgment" of the large debt it owed to me, and which contained so little evidence in support of the prefatory assertion that, by "referring to several other authorities," he had produced in any important respect a "more precise account" than I had given. If the purport of his introductory "note" was not, to use his own terms, "to supplant" my book, I think any one who reads it will say it was badly worded.

I have only one thing more to say. I have not, and I never had, the least doubt that Prof. Fowler was quite unconscious of the injustice

(as I regard it) that he was doing me. In so far as he is to be exonerated, however, it appears to me that the lax notions which are abroad as to the rights (not the legal, but the moral rights) of authors are to blame. In his first letter Mr. Fowler frankly claimed to have made only such a "perfectly honest" use of my book as "every author has a right to make of the works of his predecessors." The question is thus transferred from personal to general grounds, and I shall the less regret having troubled the readers of the Athenæum with a complaint which, as regards myself, must have wearied them, if it serves to direct attention to what appears, in these days of cheap compilations, to be an increasing neglect of authors' rights.

H. R. FOX BOYD.

P.S.—The above was written and in the editor's hands a week ago; but at my request he held it back, in order that I might see whether Mr. Sainsbury had anything to say which called for a reply from me. I need not, however, add much. I am really very sorry that I have provoked Mr. Sainsbury's wrath, all the more as it appears to have been seething for more than four years, when, had he either privately or publicly informed me of it, I could probably have easily appeased it at the time. I am most anxious to render him full justice, but he must first show how I have wronged him. He says he can "readily verify" his assertion that I "had the benefit of all his private notes and memoranda." I ask him not only to do that in any way he finds convenient, but also, in fairness to me, to prove that these "notes and memoranda," or anything else for which he thinks me indebted to him, were of any greater service to me than I have indicated. His first letter was so worded as to lead Prof. Fowler, and doubtless many others, to suspect me of "appropriating a mass of unpublished material without any acknowledgment whatsoever." He ought either to "verify" or to withdraw that accusation.

JEREMIAH RICH

Falcon Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE statement in Mr. Bailey's interesting letter (September 18th) is quite correct so far as regards a family likeness between the alphabets of many of the earlier shorthand systems, but his communication does not solve the problem I propounded, viz., whether Jeremiah Rich is entitled to be considered the inventor of the system known as 'Art's Rarity,' seeing that it is palpably a copy—not a modification, unless an important omission makes it so—of 'Semography' by William Cartwright.

Mr. Bailey has obligingly furnished me with a copy of the alphabet known as Arkiden's, which he referred to in his letter. It differs from Cartwright's alphabet in respect to ten of the characters. On the other hand, it bears a closer resemblance to the alphabet of Edmond Willis (1618), the difference being only in regard to six characters. Rich's alphabet, on the contrary, corresponds in every character to that of Cartwright, and, what is still more curious, the system is worked out in detail on the exact lines of Cartwright, and occasionally in the latter's own words. There is, however, one curious omission, viz., the absence from 'Art's Rarity' of a device which Cartwright adopted for expressing such phrases as "the sons of God," "the servants of God," &c., by means of dots (or "tittles," as the old writers called them) in different positions around the principal character—the word "God" or any other word to which the device was applicable. Yet in the 'Pen's Dexterity'—Rich's second book—which contained the former alphabet and most of the details of 'Art's Rarity,' the before-mentioned device of Cartwright was appropriated by Rich without acknowledgment, and to him has been awarded special commendation for it by Mr. Lewis and other historians of the art.

Mr. Bailey's suggestion that the scheme was worked out in common by Cartwright and Rich is unfortunately incompatible with Rich's disclaimer in his preface to Cartwright's 'Semography,' and also with the contrary statement, vouched for six persons, in the preface to 'Art's Rarity,' viz., that the latter was the invention of Rich alone. Unless further evidence is forthcoming, it would seem that the honour so long enjoyed by Rich must be now attributed to Cartwright.

EDWARD FOCKENELL.

THE LONGEVITY OF EDITORS.

Barley Lodge, Cheltenham, Nov. 23, 1880.

PERMIT me to add a provincial illustration of the longevity of editors to the metropolitan instances noticed in last week's Athenæum. In 1833 I commenced the publication of a little weekly paper entitled The Cheltenham Looker-On, and have conducted it uninterruptedly ever since, through now very nearly forty-eight years.

HENRY DAVIES.

THE PROGRESS OF ETRUSCAN DISCOVERY

THE last two numbers of the Gelehrte Anzeigen of Göttingen (November 10th and 17th) call for a few words of notice. They are almost wholly occupied by a most able digest by Dr. Deecke of the progress of Etruscan discovery during the last two years. Dr. Deecke analyzes the 330 Etruscan inscriptions in Gamurrini's appendix to Fabretti's 'Corpus Inscriptionum Italicarum' (1880), as well as the 320 new inscriptions in Fabretti's third supplement (1878). He also registers the results obtained in Pauli's 'Etruskische Studien' (1879). In this tract of forty pages, which is a marvel of compression, the reader is thus presented with the substance of the results attained in three important volumes, and is made acquainted with the bearing of all the new inscriptions on the five departments of epigraphy, grammar, vocabulary, nomenclature, and mythology. Of special interest are pp. 1442-1445, as showing at what a rapid pace our power of interpreting Etruscan inscriptions has lately been advancing. Six years ago Etruscan was almost an unknown language; now, however, the great bulk of the shorter inscriptions can be read with certainty, and as to the general meaning of several of the longer records there is no serious doubt. Inscriptions which have hitherto been regarded as hopeless riddles are, one after another, surrendering their meaning; the signification of every frequently recurring word is now known with certainty; every grammatical form, every fresh word that is gained, becoming in its turn a tool by means of which other locks are picked.

THE ENGLISH DIALECT SOCIETY.

THE English Dialect Society will next week issue to its members the publications for the present year, as follows:—'A Glossary of Words in Use in Cornwall,' with Map: I. West Cornwall, by Miss M. A. Courtney; II. East Cornwall, by Thomas A. Couch; 'A Glossary of Words and Phrases in Use in Antrim and Down,' by Wm. Hugh Patterson, M.R.I.A.; 'An Early English Hymn (Fifteenth Century), with a Phonetic Copy soon after,' by F. J. Farnvall, M.A., and A. J. Ellis, F.R.S.; 'Old Country and Farming Words, gleaned from Agricultural Books,' by James Britten, F.L.S. The first publication of the Society for 1881 is nearly ready. It is 'The Dialect of Leicestershire,' by Sebastian Evans, LL.D.; and, besides a glossary, it has chapters on Pronunciation, Grammar, Literature, Place-names, and the Domesday Measurement, a List of Local Names, and some Proverbial Sayings and Rhymes. This volume will be found specially interesting as illustrating the dialect used by George Eliot in 'Adam Bede,' which is largely quoted in the course of the work. In his chapter on "Literature," Dr. Evans says:—"Bishop Latimer's sermons abound in Leicestershire phrases, and the works of Bishop Hall, Herrick, Cleaveland, the Beaumonts, the Burtons, and other Leicestershire authors, are none of them wanting in words and idioms smacking of the soil. The author of 'The Anatomy of Melancholy' seems, indeed, to have been rather proud of what he calls his 'Dorick dialect,' and occasionally ventures on phrases and spellings which even in his own day must have seemed rather obtrusively provincial. None of the Leicestershire writers, however, are so rich in illustrations of the Leicestershire dialect as Shakspeare and Drayton, while in our own time by far its best literary exponent is the Warwickshire author of 'Adam Bede' and 'Middelmarch'."

Literary Gossip.

MR. FROUDE, we learn, is about to publish his 'Personal Reminiscences of the High Church Revival.' They are given in the form of letters to a friend, and will first appear in Good Words, beginning in the January number. The first letter deals with the Church of England fifty years ago; subsequent ones with the Tractarians, John Henry Newman, Tract XC. and its consequences, the 'Lives of the Saints,' &c.

Good news for Shelleyites: Mr. Garnett has undertaken to edit, for Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co.'s "Parchment Series," a selection from the letters of Shelley, to include only such matter as is really good in a literary sense (and the better part of Shelley's correspondence is good indeed), and aiming at the same time to exhibit the writer fully in all aspects of his character and work. Notwithstanding what has recently been so carefully done by Mr. Forman in this direction, there is ample room for the publication projected by Mr. Garnett, and it will be welcomed by many to whom Shelley's correspondence is as yet but vaguely known.

THE copy of 'Queen Mab' which we mentioned a fortnight ago was sold last week for 30l. Mr. Forman, as shown by his letter in last week's Athenæum, questions the genuineness of the MS. alterations, and his view is shared by many, although, as the price obtained shows, others are of a contrary opinion. Mr. Simpson, when the lot came up, frankly stated Mr. Forman's opinion, and said that in consequence the volume would be sold not subject to return.

MR. EDMUND W. GOSSE is about to publish a small selection of the best English odes from Spenser to Swinburne, with a critical introduction. It is the first time that such a selection has been attempted. The volume will be published by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co., and will form part of their "Parchment Library."

MR. JOSEPH THOMSON, the young African explorer, who accompanied and afterwards succeeded Mr. Keith Johnston, is now writing some papers for Good Words, giving an account of his travels. The first, 'To Usambara and Back,' will appear in the January number.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in the press a new volume of collected lectures and essays by Prof. Huxley. It will contain, besides the recent address at Birmingham on Science and Culture, which will give its name to the volume, his lectures on the coming of age of Darwinism, on evolution, on technical education, on universities, actual and ideal, on Joseph Priestley, and others which have appeared in various periodicals during the last few years.

THE revised version of the English New Testament will be issued in February next, and a 'Companion to the Revised Version of the English New Testament,' by the Rev. Alexander Roberts, D.D., Professor of Humanity, St. Andrews, and member of the New Testament Company, will be published simultaneously by Messrs. Cassell & Co., explaining the reasons for the changes made in the Authorized Version.

WE greatly regret to hear of the death of that distinguished antiquary Dr. Guest. His 'History of English Rhythms' has long been a standard work, and it is not too much to say that in his special lines of study he was quite unrivalled. He resigned only a few weeks ago the Mastership of Caius College, which he had held since 1852.

AN interesting relic of Charles Lamb was sold on Friday, the 19th inst., at Messrs. Hodgson's sale rooms. This consisted of a portrait of the essayist by his friend Hazlitt. Originally in the possession of S. T. Coleridge, the portrait passed at his death into the hands of Mrs. Gillman, from whom it was purchased by the late Mr. Edward Moxon. Started at 10/., the portrait was ultimately sold for 60/.

THE vacancy for a Government Trustee on the Council of the National Library of Ireland, at Dublin, caused by the death of the Very Rev. C. W. Russell, President of Maynooth College, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. John T. Gilbert, F.S.A., editor of the 'National Manuscripts of Ireland,' &c.

"SURFACEMAN" (Mr. Alexander Anderson), with whose verse many of our readers are familiar, has been appointed an assistant librarian in Edinburgh University.

MR. DAVID BOQUE will publish a fac-simile reprint of the earliest edition of Delaune's 'Angliæ Metropolis; or, the Present State of London,' a book just two hundred years old, showing the condition of the City of London under the later Stuart sovereigns, and embodying much interesting matter relating to its government, companies, postal arrangements, watermen, carriers, &c., and a chapter on "The New Lights." The reprint will be edited by Mr. Edward Walford.

IN commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Joseph II.'s accession to the imperial German throne, a Viennese literary society has issued a collection of poems written in honour of that philosophic monarch. The poems number in all forty-five, of which most are here published for the first time. They include contributions from older writers, such as Herder, Klopstock, Grillparzer, as well as contributions from the younger Austrian poets. It has given particular satisfaction in Vienna that so many purely German writers are represented in the collection, such as Gregorovius, Klaus Groth, Wilhelmine von Hillern, and Lingg, all anxious to add their testimony to the worth of this monarch. The poem that, however, excites most interest is one entitled 'Emperor Joseph and the Student,' which tells an anecdote of the king's life, and is written by the once popular actress of the Burg Theatre, Friedricke Gosemann, now better known under her married name of Countess von Prokeasch Osten.

THE able and original Swiss novelist Gottfried Keller will commence a new cycle of stories in the January number of the Deutsche Rundschau.

LAST year 52,263 cwt. of printing paper, worth 1,257,528 rupees, was imported into India. The value of the writing paper imported was over fourteen lakhs of rupees, and of other kinds of paper over four lakhs. Want of enterprise, it is said, is the only thing that prevents India from supplying itself with paper, the materials being ready to hand.

A new volume of poetry by the author of 'Olrig Grange,' entitled 'Raban; or, Life-Splinters,' will be published immediately by Mr. MacLehose, publisher to the University of Glasgow. Messrs. Sonnenschein & Allen will publish next week a new volume of verse, 'Drifting,' by Mr. Buchanan Reid, the well-known American poet.

MESSRS. HANSARD'S Monthly List of Parliamentary Papers for October commences with a Return (Athen. No. 2718) of great value to the student of history; it is a list of the names of every member returned to serve in each Parliament from the year 1213 to 1874 (in two volumes), specifying the names of the county, city, borough, or place for which returned; (Vol. II.) Parliaments of Great Britain, 1705 to 1796; Parliaments of the United Kingdom, 1801 to 1874; Parliaments and Conventions of the Estates of Scotland, 1357 to 1707; Parliaments of Ireland, 1559 to 1800. There are ten other Reports and Papers in the List, and fifteen Papers by Command. Among the latter are the Agricultural Statistics for Great Britain, with abstract returns for the United Kingdom, 1880; a Report by James Caird on the Condition of India; and Part II. of the Report of the Indian Famine Commission, containing Measures of Protection and Prevention.

WE regret to hear of the death of Mr. G. W. Yapp, after a few days' illness. Mr. Yapp was a contributor to the Penny Cyclopædia as early as 1837, but he became more generally known as the compiler of the Official Catalogue of the 1851 Exhibition. He was also employed on the Paris Exhibition of 1855, and he translated the catalogue of that of 1867. He was an occasional contributor to a great many journals—the Architect, Engineer, Building News, Gardener's Chronicle, and the Athenæum. At one time he was Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, and during the siege he sent some interesting letters to this journal. He never recovered the hardships he endured at the time of the blockade, and, returning to England, he devoted himself mainly to contributing to the Art Journal, and to the compilation of a work called 'Art, Pictorial and Industrial.'

THE European edition of Harper's Magazine to be issued by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. commences with the December number, which will contain, amongst its score of contributed articles, several which aim at literary or art interest. The first of a series of papers on "The English Lakes," illustrated by an English and an American artist, contains some new reminiscences of Wordsworth, gleaned by Mr. M. D. Conway. Another of a series of full-page wood engravings, in which Mr. E. A. Abbey has tried to illustrate many of Herrick's poems, will be given in this issue. Among the poems is one by Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, Nathaniel Hawthorne's daughter, and the wife of his biographer. The "Easy Chair," one of the editorial departments, contains, in connexion with some remarks on Mr. Hughes's American Rugby, a hitherto unpublished early letter by the late Dr. George Ripley, the head of the Brook Farm Association, and afterwards for many years literary editor of the New York Tribune, relating to community experiments.

IT is not quite clear if English publishers are alive to the significance of this undertaking of Messrs. Harper. Their magazine is published over here at a less price than it is in the States, and it is, therefore, obvious that it may be difficult for our magazines to compete with it. Even if the magazine is published at a loss over here, its proprietors will be recouped by their home sale, while their English competitors are practically shut out from the American market, and are dependent on the British public for support.

MR. F. MYERS's volume on Wordsworth, in Mr. Morley's series of "English Men of Letters," will be published on December 1st. Mr. Saintsbury's 'Dryden' is in the press, and will be published in January. Prof. A. W. Ward has undertaken to prepare a volume on Dickens, Prof. Masson one on De Quincey, and the Rev. Alfred Ainger one on Lamb.

WE understand that the Greek novel 'Louki Larea,' which we mentioned some weeks ago as having been translated by Mr. Gennadius, will before long be published here by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

WE hear of the death, which occurred on Monday last at Kelso, of Mr. Thomas Tod Stoddart, the author of the 'Angler's Companion' and other works on angling; he was also known as a poet, having published 'Songs and Poems,' &c. Mr. Stoddart reckoned amongst his friends Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, Prof. Aytoun, Christopher North, Sheriff Bell, and other celebrities in literature. It is said that Mr. Stoddart has left an autobiography which is intended for publication.

MARIETTE PACHA has left Paris for Egypt, but in a very indifferent state of health, we are sorry to say.

WE understand that the Count de Grasseville, son of the Emperor of Austria's Grand Chamberlain, is writing a work on Cyprus, which island he lately visited. The local government is said to have placed a large amount of official information at his disposal.

A 'GUIDE' to the Great North of Scotland Railway is in preparation, the letter-press of which will be executed by no less an authority than the chairman of the company, while sketches of landscape will be furnished by Mr. George Reid, R.S.A.

MR. DOUGLAS, of Edinburgh, has in the press the two series of lectures on Early Christian Art in Scotland lately delivered by Mr. Joseph Anderson, of the Edinburgh Museum of Antiquities, as Rhind lecturer, in succession to Dr. Arthur Mitchell. It is stated that another Edinburgh publisher has in preparation a complete and luxurious edition of the works of Allan Ramsay.

'JEANNETTE,' a novel by Mary C. Rowell, author of 'Love Loyal,' will be shortly published by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, in three volumes.

In the course of this month will be published at Weimar the correspondence of the Brothers Grimm. The brothers, as is well known, were separated little during any part of their lives, not at all in later life. The letters about to be issued, therefore, only embrace the period that lies between 1805 and 1815, when Jacob was at Paris and Vienna, and Wilhelm at Halle and Berlin. Falling, however, as these letters do, in the earlier portion of their career, they are of especial interest as showing how the studies with which their names have become bound up came to be embraced. The correspondence throws much interesting light upon the history of the younger German romantic movement, besides furnishing insight into the character of the two brothers.

The Early English Text Society will send out to its members next week its books for this year, two in each series.

SCIENCE

A Monographic Revision and Synopsis of the Trichoptera of the European Fauna. By Robert M'Lachlan, F.R.S. (Van Voorst.)

In this important monograph, issued in parts, of which the first appeared six years ago, we have the fullest and most satisfactory account of the insect order or sub-order Trichoptera, familiarly known as "caddis-flies," that has yet been given to the world. It is the outcome of many years' absorbing and painstaking study, and is in every way a credit to English biological literature. The somewhat portly volume consists of 630 pages, besides 59 very full plates containing 2,000 figures in outline, illustrating the curious modifications in essential parts of the external anatomy of nearly all the species, and all drawn under the microscope by the author himself. The whole of the known species, 474 in number, are fully described.

A work of this nature is, of course, chiefly occupied with technical descriptions of the families, genera, and species; in the Trichoptera this requires much greater detail than is necessary in other orders of insects, owing to the important part played by the veining of the wings and the form of the abdominal segments and anal appendages in the differentiation of the genera and species. It is evident that the author has not shirked any part of the severe labour thus entailed. The descriptions are full without being verbose, and all are drawn up afresh for the purposes of the work from the specimens themselves. The larvae and the curious cases they construct are described whenever they are known, and the nature of the streams or pools in which they live always specified. With regard to this Mr. M'Lachlan makes the interesting observation, founded on much personal investigation in many parts of the Alps, that streams and pools derived from glaciers are nearly always destitute of Trichopterous larvae, although water fed by land-springs at the same altitudes abounds with them. An interesting feature of the work is the completeness and exactitude of the details given with regard to the localities and geographical range of each species, for which the author has been indebted in great part to the co-operation of many willing fellow labourers in various parts of the Continent, particularly in Finland, Scandinavia, Switzerland, Saxony, and Austria, and to the recent entomological researches of the Rev. E. A. Eaton in the Pyrenees and south of France and in Spitzbergen; all stimulated by the work itself in the course of its publication, if we may judge by the fact that nearly half the described species have come to the author's knowledge since the appearance of the first part. In connexion with this Mr. M'Lachlan cordially acknowledges the help afforded by the curators of many public museums on the Continent, who entrusted to him all their material in this department. The general results of distribution are summarized and tabulated at the end of the volume. We here learn that France, with its varied configuration and climate, heads the list in the number of species it contains, namely, 201, Switzerland following with 183, Saxony with 155, Finland with 151, and the British Isles and Scandinavia with 148 apiece. Although the Trichopterous Fauna has been little studied in the Mediterranean region and in Northern and Central Asia (all included by Mr. M'Lachlan within the range of the European Fauna), it is evident, notwithstanding the author's hesitation in drawing a conclusion, that boreal and alpine regions are more favourable than warmer latitudes to the increase of these insects, a large proportion of the species being peculiar to high northern latitudes and the more elevated valleys of the Alps. Of the whole 474 species described, 409 have been found within the geographical limits of Europe as commonly understood, the remaining 65 occurring in Northern and Central Asia and Asia Minor and in the island of Madeira. Some of the European species have a range extending far beyond the European boundaries into boreal and Central Asia, and a few pass over to boreal and Arctic America; one, Limnephilus affinis, the most widely spread of all, is found throughout Europe, and in Iceland, Madeira, and Amur Land.

In the introduction Mr. M'Lachlan discusses the knotty points connected with the systematic position of the Trichoptera, a quite different question from that of their natural relations to the rest of the composite Linnean order Neuroptera. The difficulty arises from the want of homogeneity of the Neuroptera in structural characters and in mode of individual development or metamorphosis, and, at the same time, the absence of differences sufficient to warrant the separation of the component parts as so many independent orders. It is a question of rank in classification, and concerns chiefly the pure systematist, whose fine sense of symmetry and proportion is not satisfied without some approach to uniformity in the value of groups of the same denomination. Mr. M'Lachlan inclines to the separation of the Trichoptera as a distinct order. He does not, however, wholly neglect the far more important question of real genetic relations, and states his reasons for believing in a proximate connexion between his favourite group and the Lepidoptera. The introduction also contains a full account of the external structure of the group, and a few remarks regarding the parts to be selected for generic and specific characters and the mode of treating the specimens for preservation in collections. A complete systematic catalogue, besides index of families, genera, and species (with synonyms), concludes the volume.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

SIGNORI MATTEUCCI AND MARSHALL, not being able to penetrate Wadai, propose now to explore the countries to the south of Dar Fur, and to settle more especially the lower course of the Welle, concerning which we have learned but little from Dr. Potogass's extensive travels.

Senhor Estanislao S. Zeballos, President of the Argentine Geographical Institute, has returned from an excursion into the south-western portion of the confederation, in the course of which he met with high mountains, inhabited by Araucans, instead of the boundless Pampas which still figure upon our maps. He has carefully mapped the country traversed, and brings home with him sixty-four large photographs.

The Revue de Géographie publishes the concluding portion of M. P. Gafarel's paper on the voyages of the Zeni. The author's conclusions are as follows: the voyages actually took place; Zichmi is a corruption of "thegn" or "thane," and stands for Henry Sinclair, lord of the Orkneys; Frislanda is the Farver; Estland is Shetland; Icaria is Anticosti, or some other island in its neighbourhood; Estotiland is Newfoundland; Drogeo is continental America; the people spoken of as living to the south-west of Drogeo, and having towns, temples, and idols, are the Mexicans. Estotiland had at that time a European colony, and the author is inclined to agree with M. Beauvais that these colonists were Kacoci, i.e. Irish Soots.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

The comet found by Mr. Lohse at Dun Echt on the night of the 7th inst. has proved (as is now pretty generally known) to be identical with that discovered by Mr. Lewis Swift at Rochester, N.Y., on the 10th of last month. There seems to be little doubt that it is, in fact, a reappearance of a comet discovered by Herr Tempel (now Director of the Royal Observatory at Arcetri) at Marseilles on the 27th of November, 1869, and reckoned as Comet III. 1869. Dr. Bruhns, who computed its orbit on that occasion, remarked that the observations, extending over about a month, indicated deviation from parabolic path; and this surmise of elliptic orbit appears now to be established. As the perihelion passage in 1869 occurred on November 20th, and on this occasion on November 7th, the period is very nearly eleven years. There is no record, we believe, of any previous appearance having been observed. According to the ephemeris of Mr. S. C. Chandler, of Boston, U.S., the comet was nearest the earth on the 17th inst., at a distance of about seventeen millions of miles; but it would seem that the actual apparent brightness began to diminish before this, and even before the perihelion passage. The perihelion distance from the sun was about 1.10 in terms of the earth's mean distance. The comet is now in the constellation Perseus, but is probably out of the reach of any but powerful telescopes. According to an ephemeris calculated by Herr Zelbr and Dr. J. von Hepperger, of the Imperial Observatory, Vienna, its place at Berlin midnight to-morrow, the 29th inst., will be R.A. 2^h 57^m, N.P.D. 36° 14'; and on Thursday next, December 2nd, R.A. 3^h 41^m, N.P.D. 38° 47'.

No. 4 of Vol. III. of the Boston Science Observer contains a view of the new observatory which is being erected at Rochester, N.Y., by Mr. H. H. Warner, to be called the Warner Observatory. It will be placed under the care of Mr. (now Prof.) Swift, and will be provided with an equatorial telescope of 16-inch aperture by Messrs. Alvan Clark & Sons. Prof. H. L. Smith, of Hobart College, Geneva, N.Y., contributes to that number of the Observer a description of a new equatorial stand, which he has contrived and applied to an excellent achromatic, made by Tolles, of 4½-inch aperture and 37-inch focus.

The Andromedes or meteors supposed to be connected with Biela's comet are due to-night (27th inst.), and the absence of moonlight will be favourable to searchers for them. Last year a considerable shower was expected in consequence of the earth passing near the point of the comet's orbit where the comet itself would have been due; but its failure to appear may have been partly owing to the moon, which was then full on November 28th. It will be interesting to note whether many are seen on the present occasion; the watch for them is easy, as the radiant point is above the horizon all night.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Nov. 18.—W. Spottiswoods, Esq., President, in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On the Essential Properties and Chemical Character of Beryllium,' and 'On the Molecular Heat and Volume of the Rare Earths and their Sulphates,' by Messrs. L. F. Nilson and O. Pettersen.—'On the Absorption Spectra of Cobalt Salts,' by Dr. W. J. Russell.—and 'On the Friction of Water against Solid Surfaces of different Degrees of Roughness,' by Prof. W. C. Unwin.—Prof. G. Bell made experiments with his photophone, demonstrating the transmission of sound along a beam of light.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—Nov. 22.—Right Hon. Lord Aberdeen, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Lieut.-Gen. Sir M. A. S. Biddulph, Sir T. G. Briggs, Col. J. Morland, Major J. Alleyne, Major C. C. S. Moncrieff, Capt. E. Bull, Lieut. F. T. N. Spratt, Lieut. H. L. Wells, Hon. W. Egerton, Rev. N. A. B. Borton, Rev. J. L. Carrick, Rev. J. C. Lambert, Messrs. J. B. Arthur, H. F. Ashbee, C. P. Austin, B. Brocklehurst, H. J. Buckwell, O. J. Cattley, J. P. Deane, R. W. Dillon, W. H. Heaton, J. H. Heaton, W. Haworth, H. J. Hopkins, W. Jackson, H. Keene, W. Libbey, W. E. MacIvor, A. Marno, J. Meldrum, G. Mercer, C. R. Nunn, C. P. Pounds, F. B. Pulling, W. H. Richardson, J. Russell, J. Sherman, F. B. Smith, W. E. Sprungall, J. Stewart, A. B. Thorburn, H. G. Thornton, and T. Walker.—The paper read was 'Temperate South Africa, considered as a Route to the Central Equatorial Region,' by the Right Hon. Sir H. Bartle E. Frere, Bart.

GEOLOGICAL.—Nov. 17.—R. Etheridge, Esq., President, in the chair.—Prof. J. H. Thompson was elected a Fellow.—The following communications were read: 'On Abnormal Geological Deposits in the Bristol District,' by Mr. C. Moore, and 'Interglacial Deposits of West Cumberland and North Lancashire,' by Mr. J. D. Kendall.

BRITISH ARCHEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—Nov. 17.—Rev. S. M. Mayhew in the chair.—Rev. Prebendary North described an early font, apparently Saxon, in Stanton Church, Gloucester.—Rev. J. A. Lloyd reported the discovery of Saxon carved work during the recent restoration of his church at Broad Hinton, Wilts, and exhibited a full-size drawing.—Mr. L. Brock reported the discovery of a Roman pavement of beautiful design in the clove, Winchester, of which the Rev. C. Collier sent a drawing.—Mr. Walker produced and described the matrix of the old Chapter seal of the church of St. Peter, Wolverhampton, which has replaced an earlier one of silver now lost.—Mr. Lewis described a kitchen-midden at the Roman castle of Pevensey, and exhibited several fragments of very early pottery. He exhibited a rubbing of a Saxon coffin lid found at Bexhill Church, where much Saxon walling has been found above the Roman arches during recent repairs.—Mr. W. Myers produced a vast number of Blat implements from Cisbury Camp, and described the circumstances of their discovery upon the surface of the ground, where large quantities may be found.—Mr. C. Brent exhibited a Hebrew phylactery and a remarkable Etruscan puzzle case without any aperture.—The Chairman produced several beautiful specimens of early pottery found in London; also an early Chinese carving in Jasper, found in excavations in Bishopsgate.—Mr. T. Morgan read a paper 'On the Results of the recent Congress at Leizes,' and reviewed the principal objects inspected, alluding especially to the discussion at the meeting at Stonehenge.—The second paper was by Mr. C. H. Compton, 'On the Cradle Tower in the Tower of London,' which has recently been opened out and freed from the modern buildings that surrounded it. The roof is beautifully groined, and, as the reader observed, the tower afforded access from the moat to the queen's apartments. The whole has been repaired under the direction of Mr. Taylor, of H.M. Office of Works. A large Roman brick from the recently discovered wall was exhibited and described.

NUMISMATIC.—Nov. 18.—J. Evans, Esq., President, in the chair.—Lord E. S. Churchill, Dr. C. R. Stipnagel, Messrs. L. Blacker, R. Nelson, and J. Tophes were elected Members.—Mr. B. V. Head exhibited, on behalf of Mr. H. Baker, a set of countermarked shillings of the present century, all having the appearance of being designedly stamped, but with what object it was not apparent.—Mr. J. Tophes exhibited a selection from a hoard of silver coins lately found at Nottingham, among which were two double-struck pennies of Henry I.; eight of Stephen, struck at Norwich, Nottingham, London, &c., two being countermarked with a cross; one of Matilda similar to Hawkins's Suppl., Pl. VI., No. 634, rev., SVE ONOX; and one of Roger, Earl of Warwick, Hawkins's Suppl., Pl. VI., No. 632.—The Baron G. de Worms exhibited a gold pound sovereign of Elizabeth, m.m. woolpack; a crown piece of James VIII., the elder Pretender; and other coins.—Mr. T. T. Bent exhibited two copper coins of the Republic of San Marino, 1869 and 1875; a Danish coin of Waldemar III. der Store; a coin of Frederic di Montefeltro, d. 1482, Duke of Urbino; and a copper coin of Pavia, s.e., emperor's head; rev., SAN SIRO, 1693.—The Rev. Canon Powells exhibited a bronze medal of Charles I., by J. Roettier, r.v., TERTIV. EX. ME. FORTYVAM EX. ALIJS, a head from out of a cloud holding a martyr's crown; a silver medal of James II. and his queen, by Bower, rev., SEMPER TIBI PERDENT RANVS, in exergue MAYFRAGA REPERTA, 1687; and a bronze medallion of Calvin, executed by A. Bovy, chief medallist of the Swiss Mint in 1864; rev., ECCLESIAE REFORMATOR. GENEVAE PASTOR ET TYTAMEN. CORPORE FRACVS. ANIMO POTENS. FIDE VICTOR. IL TEINT FERME COME S'IL EVST VEV CELVY QVI EST INVISIBILE.—Mr. A. J. Evans read a paper on some recent discoveries of Illyrian coins, the result of considerable personal researches in North Albania and Southern Dalmatia. From the mountains above Guineje the writer had obtained a small hoard of Illyrian coins, belonging chiefly to the second century B.C., and comprising many types entirely new to numismatists.—The Rev. Canon Powells read a paper 'On the Testoons of Edward VI.' to prove that some among them, of base metal, bearing mintmarks identical with some of Henry VIII.'s coins (Indisputably Irish), and being, moreover, identical in date with the fine silver struck for England, are, in fact, the Irish currency of Edward VI., against the badness of which all Ireland was then exclaiming.

LINEAN.—Nov. 18.—R. M'Lehlan, Esq., in the chair.—Lieut.-Col. H. Godwin Austin was elected a Fellow.—Dr. G. Dobson exhibited a remarkable parasitic worm from the intestine of Megaderma fross, from the Gold Coast. It appears allied to Pterygodermatites plagiatus, Wedl, from the long-eared hedgehog, though on first hasty examination Dr. Dobson had been disposed to regard it as a new genus, Metabellia. Dr. M'Donald further drew attention to its peculiar anatomical structure and relationships.—Dr. Cobbold agreed to the importance of the observations as verifying previous discoveries, with addition of novel structural details. He considered the worm as identical with the Ophio-stomum of Rudolphi and Willemoes Suhm, with Pterygodermatites of Wedl, and with Rictularia of Froelich, and he regarded it as an aberrant member of the Ophio-stomidae, whereas Wedl thought it came nearest the Cheilacanthidae. Dr. Cobbold also exhibited specimens of Diatoma crassum. Previously, in 1875, some had been brought before the Society from a Chinese missionary, who on going back to China with his wife and daughter was again attacked by the parasite, and they had been obliged to return to England.—A paper was read 'On a Proliferous Condition of Verbascum nigrum,' by the Rev. G. Henslow. The upper part of the plant was very diffuse with leafy axes produced from the centres of the flowers, while the lower part had flowers with very large ovaries adherent within to arrested proliferous branches. These differences may be attributed to the general tendency of the sap to run to the extremities, and thus cause an excess of development above with simultaneous arrested condition below.—A paper 'On the Classification of the Gastropoda,' Part II., was read by Dr. J. D. M'Donald. In this communication the author gave further data in support of his mode of arranging the group dependent on anatomical characters.—'Nematode Capensis' was the title of a paper by Messrs. P. MacOwan and H. Bolus, in which among other novelties described of South African plants were Ranunculus Beuvii, Orthocarpus ambigua, and Herposiphon Capensis, the last a representative of a form hitherto known only from Australia.—A communication from the Rev. J. M. Berkeley, 'On Australian Fungi,' Part II., principally received from Baron F. von Mueller, was taken as read.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Nov. 18.—Prof. Huxley, V.P., in the chair.—The Secretary read a Report on the additions made to the Society's menagerie from June to November.—Mr. W. K. Parker read a paper on the development of the skull in the Urodela Batrachians.—Mr. Parker described the skull of the adult gigantic Salamander (Siredonia macrura), the Siren, and the Menopoma, and compared their structure with that of the various stages of the skull of the common newt.—Mr. G. E. Dobson made remarks on the head of a Partridge (Perdix cinerea), with an extraordinary prolongation of the intermaxillary bone, and Mr. W. A. Forbes on the shedding of the horns of the Prong-buck (Antilocapra americana), as recently observed in the specimen living in the Society's Gardens.—Mr. Scollar exhibited the skin of the Guinea Fowl lately described in the Society's Proceedings as Nemida thibet. Further investigation had induced him to believe that this bird was the same as Nemida guichardi of Hartlaub, the inaccurate colouring of the head in Mr. Elliot's figure of that species having prevented its identification.—Papers were read: by Mr. G. A. Boulenger, 'On the Palmarote and Ethiopian Species of Batr.' of which he recognised ten species, four in the Palmarote, five in the Ethiopian region, and one found in both regions,—from Dr. O. Finsch, 'On the Birds of the Island of Ruk, in the Central Caroline,' and 'On some new or little-known Species of Pigeons from the Caroline Islands,'—from Mr. E. A. Smith, 'On the Shells of the Genus Myndora of Gray,'—from Mr. M. Jacoby, 'On a Collection of Phytophagous Coleoptera made by Mr. Buckley at Eastern Ecuador,'—and by Messrs. F. D. Godman and O. Salvin, 'On some supposed new Species of Butterflies,' collected by Mr. A. Goldie in the interior of the district of Port Moresby, New Guinea.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—Nov. 1.—Sir J. Lubbock, Bart., V.P., in the chair.—Mr. E. Mayrick and Capt. T. Brown were elected Ordinary Members, and Dr. J. E. Brindt a Foreign Member.—Mr. Waterhouse exhibited, on behalf of Mr. S. Olliffe, a pair of dwarfed specimens of Epione wespertaria, taken at Arundel.—Mr. M'Lehlan exhibited some curious galls on a broad-leaved eucalyptus from Australia, which were stated to be made by a lepidopterous larva, and also mentioned that in a letter received from Mr. Rutherford, dated from Cameroons, West Africa, the writer stated that he had taken Papilio merops and Papilio cecus in copula.—Mr. Trimen doubted that the butterfly referred to by Mr. Rutherford was P. cecus, Stoll, which to the best of his knowledge was a form of the female confined to South Africa, and was more probably either Hippocoon, Fab., or one of the other prevalent West African forms.—Prof. Westwood exhibited a globular gall on the surface of a willow leaf made by a species of Tenthredinidae, and also a dipterous larva (Syrphus) found closely adhering to the stem of a pelargonium.—Mr. Kirby exhibited a remarkable variety of Epnada tulitula, and also a remarkable form of Apatura, stated to have been taken by Mr. Ralfe in Finner Wood.—Sir J. Lubbock exhibited some interesting larva which Mr. Culvert had forwarded to him from the Troad through Sir J. Hooker. He stated that these larva had recently appeared there in great numbers and were likely to prove most useful, as they fed on the eggs of locusts. These larva were probably coleopterous, and Sir J. Lubbock suggested that if the species does not exist in Cyprus, it might be worth while to introduce it there.—Mr. Trimen exhibited a wingless female specimen of the Hymenoptera which he had strong grounds for believing was the female of the well-known Doryctes helveticus, Linn. Mr. Trimen also exhibited six cases fabricated by a South African lepidopterous larva, of which the outer covering consisted of particles of sand and fragments of stone, which gave them a most peculiar aspect, resembling in general appearance a myriapod.—Sir R. Saunders read a paper 'On the Habits and Affinities of the Hymenopterous Genus Pelaterodermis in the sober and limited simplicity of Giotto's groups in the Arena Chapel the profound thought and feeling for the grander aspects of nature which are more obvious in the completely developed art of the Sistine Chapel and the Stanze of the Vatican."

Technical knowledge will enable a student to criticize the masterpieces of Michael Angelo and Raphael much more justly than omniscience as to the history of art. Surely, too, a man thus technically and historically informed is already "the possessor of a cultivated mind," whatever his attainments in letters or science may be.

We say this to supplement, and not to controvert, what Mr. Poynter has written; no one has a deeper respect for technical skill than he. We agree with him in what follows on the preciousness of primitive art and of due appreciation for it. With his exaltation of the Parthenon sculptures far above "the most renowned Italian art of the sixteenth century" every one ought to agree. We desire, with Mr. Poynter, the formation of a museum in which casts from the great sculptures of antiquity may be a means of familiarizing "our future Mummies" with the fact that works of beauty have a price beyond their commercial value. It is impossible not to admire the clever manner in which the expression of this desire is made to lead to condemnation of the "barbarous demolition and looting" of the Summer Palace of the Chinese emperor, which might have been prevented if respect for the beautiful work of men's hands had been taught as a lesson in the boyhood of our military heroes. Such respect is, indeed, as Mr. Poynter affirms, one of the most desirable lessons to be learned from the history of art.

A history of painting which deals with the subject from the Egyptians to Tiepolo must needs be brief. Nevertheless there is in this volume a vast amount of knowledge carefully put together by Mr. Head's pen. The book is, of course, a compilation, but it is enriched with special notes by Mr. Poynter, whose hand is to be recognized in the concise and appreciative analyses of the art of Mantegna, Michael Angelo, and a few other painters. There are slips here and there which may well be corrected by-and-by; for example, we hear again on p. 79—for the last time, let us hope—of Pietro Cavallini, who has been identified by "some" with the "Italian artist who designed the shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey, and the crosses in memory of Queen Eleanor." This is a sentence in which there are about as many exploded blunders as words. On the whole, however, this book is the best of its class in English, and ought to be valued accordingly.

GIFT-BOOKS.

Messrs. LONGMANS send us a new edition of the Lays of Ancient Rome, with illustrations on wood by Mr. J. R. Weguelin. Its publication attests the apparently undying popularity of Lord Macaulay's Lays, and the cuts attached to it are of unusual merit, and suffice to give a new charm to the verse. Especially noticeable are the youthful "messenger of war," blowing his trumpet and waving his javelin towards the Etruscan warriors, the girls treading the grapes, and "The Three."

English Lake Scenery (Walker & Co.) comprises coloured plates from drawings made by Mr. A. F. Lydon. Some of the plates are very good in their way, others are garish and weak. Among the former are the pretty panoramas of 'Windermere and Esthwaite' and 'Windermere.' To those who are not determined to reject "coloured plates" altogether this little volume may prove acceptable as a somewhat more than tolerable gift-book from an artistic point of view. As an "ornament for the drawing-room table" it will be quite in its place.

The Magazine of Art, Illustrated (Camell & Co.), is the third yearly volume of a copiously illustrated periodical, the chief aim of which is to be popular—cultured if possible, but, above all, "popular." As the work is characterized by grace and sweetness, and there are many elements of merit in it, we can with a good conscience commend it to the public whom it addresses with considerable success. There are no sins against good taste, and some of the woodcuts are charming; for instance, the portrait of the Countess Polocka from the Berlin Gallery. A series of biographies of artists is the most acceptable portion of the letter-press. The portraits attached are of very unequal value.

Men of Mark: a Gallery of Contemporary Portraits. Fifth Series. (Sampson Low & Co.)—This series, like its predecessors, deserves praise. The portraits are, as before, due to Messrs. Lock & Whittfield; the biographical notices which accompany them were written by Mr. T. Cooper. A defect which greatly mars the value of the portraits has already been noticed in these columns; it arises from the practice of "touching on" the faces of the likenesses, smoothing out the creases and furrows of time, labour, and sorrow, prevailing in the works. Notwithstanding this most of the examples are very good; that of Lord Cairns is excellent, the pose of the head and features being exceptionally happy and energetic. Mr. Roebuck could hardly be better, unless it had been let alone. With these let us class Sir J. D. Hooker and Mr. Vicat Cole.

Switzerland, its Scenery and its People, Pictorially Represented. (Blackie & Son.)—This is one of the most richly illustrated books of the class, a member of which appears every year, and it may be fairly ranked with the 'Rome' of M. Wey, and the sumptuous volumes on India, Spain, and other countries which we have already noticed. The woodcuts are of the kind we are accustomed to find in the Tour du Monde, and neither in typography nor binding does this book differ from those which owe their existence to that capital publication. It is not equal to the best of them, but it is better than some of them. Neat, precise, conventional, brilliant, but rather mechanical than artistic, these woodcuts can hardly be called works of art, but they have some of the merits of photographs, with few or none of the defects proper to camera pictures. There is no poetry about the cuts. Yet it is impossible to deny that they give a tolerable idea of the outward semblance of the places they represent, and they are quite sufficient for those who do not care for more. A large part of the letter-press is historical and very neatly and carefully written, in a clear but somewhat chilly style. This part of the work is associated with numerous historical illustrations, which are the least commendable, because they are the most ambitious, of the decorations of the volume. On the other hand, where more than portraiture has been aimed at the results are very satisfactory. There is, for example, a telling view of the Staubeach facing p. 236, where the effect of light and chiaroscuro has been made very serviceable. One of the best of the vignettes is on p. 215, where the Gauli glacier is very ably treated; the representation of the Axen Strasse is acceptable. It would occupy too much of our space to describe all the bright and pleasing views in which the book abounds so richly that nearly every page is enlivened by their presence. The volume deals with the country in sections, including the Rhone valley, the lakes of Geneva and Lucerne, and the Oberland.

British Painters of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries. Illustrated. (Bogue.)—This volume does not profess to give a detailed or complete account of the art of the periods indicated by its title. It contains brief and very popular accounts of some of the better-known artists, whose careers and works afforded subjects so various that it is easy to see that no rule of choice was observed when the selection was made. As a collection of "all sorts" the book will be acceptable, but a finer taste would not have placed side by side some of the least worthy artists and some of the worthiest England has produced during the two centuries. The woodcuts are sometimes good, occasionally their subjects are admirable enough to give a charm to them and brighten the pages on which they appear. Readers of very catholic tastes will find the biographies pleasant to read, and will even linger over many of the cuts. Startling statements puzzle the reader here and there, as where he is told to recognise a connexion between the doings of the Royal Academicians and the passing of the Reform Bill. Some of the criticisms are "odd" and most of them are "old-fashioned," but none of them is ungenerous.

The Wooing of the Water-Witch: a Northern O'Ditty. By J. M. Smith. (Chatto & Windus.)—This little book contains a legend of a bold Viking and his love, the mer-maiden of the northern seas, the wanderings and adventures of the hero. The text is made to be extremely tiresome by means of an affectation of "Norse" phraseology for the earlier part, and the prevalence of a false local colouring which is derived from that circumstance. Needless pains have been taken to keep up this whimsical blunder, a crotchet the author had better avoid in future. Translated into English the legend is readable, but not sufficiently so to justify any one in mastering the absurd jargon employed for part of the narrative. Some of the cuts are laughable, but many more do not deserve that

THE WINTER EXHIBITION, DUDLEY GALLERY.

THIS well-used gallery contains nearly five hundred paintings in oil, which are mostly sketches made during autumn holidays, and embody studies from nature of an easy-going sort, that involve a very small amount of design—that is, thinking, invention, or technical experiments. The level attained by the painters is respectable, but there are few remarkable pictures. If any difference exists between this collection and its forerunners it is to the disadvantage of the present exhibition. There is even less solid and searching workmanship here than hitherto—fewer signs of active inspiration. The best pictures here are two by Mr. G. D. Leslie, two by Mr. Aumonier, one by M. Lhermitte, and one by Mr. H. S. Marks. A few of less importance are mentioned below. We shall notice the whole in the order of the catalogue, and therefore take first Mr. T. B. Macquoid's Old Courtyard, Italy (No. 28), which, though rather painty, is sunny in effect and dexterously handled.—It may be compared with No. 33, by Mr. Perkins, The Strumper's Cottage, a group of whitewashed buildings in sunlight, of which the shadows are black to excess. The composition is excellent.—Mr. Aumonier's Winter Hill, near Great Marlborough (51) is a charming study of the Thames in rainy weather, noteworthy for richness of colour and atmospheric effect, and for the clever handling of the grey or shining levels of the water, its shadowed ripples and bright undulations. Cookham on Thames (236), by the same, is a capital painter's sketch, resembling No. 51 in its good qualities, and quite as true to nature.—M. Fantin's Printer de Fleurs d'Automne (53) shows a departure from the painter's ordinary practice with cold grey and opposed tints in favour of warmer greys and ruddy hues. The artist shows his characteristic appreciation of the textures and local colours of the flowers, and we never saw a better specimen of his skill, except when he has paid more attention to the composition of the masses. Here the composition is awkward. The same artist sends Nasturtiums (116).—A Spanish Lady (61), by Mr. Burgess, a dashing dame, standing and looking at us with an arch expression, has, despite its roughness, unusual refinement of touch and colour, and, although but a sketch, is animated in treatment, action, and expression.—Sisters (83), by Mr. J. Clark, two children seated side by side, reading, and seriously at play, is rather coarse and painty, and there is over much brown in all parts; the heads are curiously disproportioned, but the painter's feeling for simple and childlike character, which has never yet failed him, gives a charm it is hard to resist.—The Thames at Hurley (94) is by Mr. J. S. Hill, and, like numerous sketches here, shows that our artists, who like to find their subjects ready made, and seek to represent beauty in landscape rather than to be able to deal with technical problems such as exercised Turner, have deserted those purlieus of Betwix-y-Cood which are sacred to the memory of David Cox in favour of the pretty scenes which F. Walker and others seem to have discovered for them. With these amateurs the subject makes the picture, not, as with true artists, the picture the subject. Mr. Hill's painting is pretty and effective; it shows a cloudy evening over a marsh, a wind-beaten river, and much foliage.

In Mr. Heywood Hardy's Study of Fox Hounds (96) the dogs' heads are very cleverly "pencilled"; in fact they are a capital example of dexterous manipulation, and a considerable success in canine portraiture.—A promising student in portraiture is Mr. A. A. Calderon, who has produced No. 109, called The Lady of the Present, which is carefully painted, in good form and style, with excellent discrimination of character.—The Scarlet Ibis (128) is by Mr. M. Hale, and depicts a recumbent figure in red-and-white drapery, caressed by the sacred bird; it is too nearly like a "study in red" by Mr. A. Moore to be acceptable. The questionable drawing is no departure from the type affected by Mr. Hale, although it is a regrettable element of a picture of considerable merit.—The Monastery Wall (142), a landscape containing a vista of a road, bounded by a hedge and an old red-brick garden wall, would have been more charming than it is if the painter had allowed himself to deal with the brilliancy of sunlight on the scene in something like the force and with the richness of nature. As it is, the greyish sunlight is better defined than coloured. The handling, which is not without vigour, is rather heavy. It is the work of Mr. A. de Breański.

Apple Dumplings (150) is a good example of Mr. Leslie's style, but it is mannered to the core. Still, there is much that is decidedly delightful in the figure of the pretty housemaid who sits on a kitchen table and deftly peels a sour apple. The colouring is a repetition of that of a piece of old Nankin blue china, with complementary tints. Rough as the little picture is, and monotonous as are the tones and tints of the background, the vivacity of the expression and originality of the motive of the figure will ensure a welcome for the work. Cherry Pie (162), by the same artist, the pendant to the last, is much less acceptable. A plump cook is contemplating a newly-made pie with all the pride of art; the draughtsmanship of the tart is honourable to both artists, the modeller and the painter. Mr. Leslie's share in the still-life accessories has been performed to admiration.—The Old Squire's Favourite (167), a large picture of its class, is not worthy of Mr. Heywood Hardy. The figures of the gentleman and boy, who are riding in a woodland road, are disproportioned to each other, and the background, though cleverly painted, is slight. A more important defect is the failure to represent the action of the boy's pony, which is supposed to be trotting; its legs are much too small.—In Linselle (162), by Mr. MacLaren, a head is drawn with exceptional firmness, but not perfectly. It is excellently modelled.—M. Lhermitte, always happy in respect to tone, was never more so than in Le Calvaire de Mont St. Père (180), a vista of a village street of old white cottages, with an ancient cross and a group of trembling sycamores. The grey colour is almost pathetic, so truly in keeping with the subject in it. The composition is less happy.—We have had pleasure in looking at Mr. Lucas's crisp and clear, bright, and dexterously treated "Should our acquaintance be forgot?" (209), a group of tattered books, boys' toys, a slate, and cane.—A pretty vista of a canal, called The Northern Venice (219), by Mr. A. G. Bell, is acceptable on account of the warmth and softness of its bright effect on lines of old houses and shining water.—Mr. H. S. Marks's The Miller of Dee (228), a half-length figure of a man leaning on the hutch of the entrance to his mill, could hardly be truer or fuller of humour and spirit without demonstrativeness. The face of the miller is perfect in its way. We do not see why his hands should be free of flour.—Near the Land's End (248) is a brilliant and solidly modelled little coast view, resplendent with sunlight on the deep azure seas and ruddy cliffs. It is by Mr. O. P. Knight, and deserves a much better place.—A Summer Storm, Venice (255), by Mr. J. Mac Whirter, shows that it is possible to vulgarize Venice.—Mr. H. Moore's sea-view, A Break—after a Wild Day (281) presents nothing new, and it is not worthy of him.—We commend No. 290, The Village Mill, by Mr. C. D. Brockman; Chrysanthemums (311), by Mr. A. Ward; Love among the Roses (313), by Miss J. Haylar, and her two neat and firm views of rooms, called A Day's Sport (420) and The Rural Bats (438).—Lucretia (421), by Mr. Rooke, is a design for decoration, and depicts the heroine flourishing the fatal knife most awkwardly, not to say affectedly. Her expression is artificial and grotesqueness, and there is much in it that is unwholesome and puerile. A charming study in tints of rich blue, it is a pity the bad drawing mars the picture for artistic eyes.

M. LÉON COGNIE

In the person of this distinguished painter European art has lost one of the ablest of its professors, a man remarkable as a painter and almost as remarkable as a teacher. Léon Cogniet was born in Paris in 1794, and in due time became one of the pupils of Guérin, from whom he received that inheritance of learned art which he imparted to many of the more accomplished living artists of France. Among his pupils are MM. Meissonier, J. P. Laurens, Lucien Mélingue, L. Bonnat, Jules Lefebvre, H. Lemacher, Feytaud Perrin, and Luminais, and Mlle. Nélis Jacquemart. In 1817 Cogniet obtained the Grand Prix de Rome, and while occupied at the Villa Medici sent to the Salon of 1822 a noteworthy picture, called 'Metabus, King of the Volscians, expelled by his Subjects.' Next came that learned and masculine work which has long decorated the Luxembourg, the 'Marius in the Ruins of Carthage,' which was engraved by Gélée and S. W. Reynolds. His 'Numa' was likewise bought by the Government, and was, we believe, burned during the Commune in the hall of the Conseil d'État, of which it was long an important ornament.

Appointed Professor of Drawing in the Lyceum of Louis le Grand and the Polytechnic School, Cogniet settled in Paris, and devoted himself to teaching art in the French manner.

He continued to exhibit remarkable pictures, about the merits of which there has been from first to last not a little discussion. In succession appeared 'The Murder of the Innocents,' 1824, which attracted much attention; 'The Charity of St. Stephen,' which is in the church of St. Nicolas des Champs; and 'The National Guard marching to join the Army in 1792,' a highly dramatic and expressive picture. The 'Battle of Ravoli' is at Versailles, where are his illustrations of episodes of the campaign in Egypt, in producing which other painters had shared. Pictures of Russian and Spanish subjects followed the above. 'A Scene at the Barricades' was inspired by the troubles of 1830, when it appeared at the Luxembourg. Cogniet's best-known work is the extremely impressive 'Tintoretto painting his Dead Daughter,' 1845, which is now at Bordeaux, and has been more than once engraved. He was a member of the Council of the École des Beaux-Arts, and received a medal of the second class in 1824, of the first class in 1855. He became a Knight of the Legion of Honour in 1828, and Officer in 1846; a member of the Institute in 1849.

THE VIA DI S. SABINA.

THE VIA DI S. SABINA, on the Aventine, follows the line of an ancient street, the pavement of which has been found several times. It was seen and described by Nerini in the year 1775, between the churches of S. Alessio and S. Sabina. It came to light again in 1867, when, after the battle of Mentana, the Aventine was fortified by General Kanizer, and surrounded with moats and ditches. In July last it was discovered for the third time, near the church of S. M. del Priorato, just opposite that famous garden gate, the keyhole of which has seen more lovely eyes than any other keyhole in the world. I never happened to be at that out-of-the-way spot without meeting groups of Anglo-Saxon girls trying to spy the cupola of St. Peter through the keyhole of Il Priorato. The ancient street was one of the most aristocratic in that aristocratic quarter of the Aventine. It was lined with the stately mansions of L. Asinius Rufus, the friend of Pliny the younger; of Cæcina Decius Maximus Bassilius, Prefect of the Pretorium in 458; of Sex. Cornelius Repentinus, son-in-law of the Emperor Didius Julianus; of M. Valerius Bradua, cos. 191; of Publia Valeria Comana, daughter of Valerius Comazon, cos. 220; and so on. During our latest excavations we came across the remains of a circular building, with columns and entablature beautifully cut in white Carrara marble. The bas-reliefs of the frieze represent groups of sea monsters and tritons holding a medallion of Faustina the elder, or else of a lady resembling à s'y méprendre to that empress. We have found also a marble tripod, four feet high, ornamented with æonic masks, gorgonic heads, dancing fauns, &c., the broken head of a colossal bronze statue, some terra-cotta friezes, lead pipes, &c.

The foundations of the left tower at the Porta del Popolo have been dug out, as was done two years before with those of the right tower. They were built with the remains of the magnificent tombs which formerly lined the Via Flaminia. We have found many blocks belonging to the friezes, pediments, and other architectural parts of the mausolea, and the tombstone, six feet long, of Q. Trebellianus Catulus, quæstor of the Provincia Narbonensis, commander of the sixteenth legion under Claudius, &c.

Another tombstone mentions the names of C. Gallonius Maritimus, and of Q. Marcianus Turbo, a famous captain under the reign of Hadrian.

Near the church of S. Bibiana, thirty-five feet below the level of the Viale Principessa Margherita, we have discovered the archaic stone quarry from which the materials for the Palatium of Horatian fame, have been taken. The bed of rock, which is called "cappellaccio," is cut into several parallel galleries; there are many blocks ready for transportation. Others have been cut on two or three sides only; the size of others is marked on the rock with grooves or lines. The quarry seems to have been abandoned in the first or the second century of the republican era, because the pottery found within the galleries is of a primitive workmanship, and contemporary with the pottery found within the early tombs of the Esquilina.

The line of the Servian walls has been discovered, save a few interruptions, all along the northern slopes of the Quirinal, in the Piazza Magnanopoli, in the Antonelli Palace, in the Colonna Gardens, in the Via della Dateria, and so on, as far as the Porta Collina, near which the ordinary walls were substituted by the Agger. The vacant spaces are being filled up by new bits coming to light at frequent intervals. On September 21st a beautiful fragment of the fortification was discovered in the garden of Signor Feliciani, 17, Via de' Giardini. The fragment occupies the whole space between the Via de' Giardini and the Quattro Fontane; it corresponds very nearly to the site of the Capitolium Vetus. A mithriac bas-relief in marble, representing the usual scene of the sacrifice of the bull, lay buried at the foot of the wall.

The English colony is building a church at the corner of the Via Babuino and Gesù e Maria, on very difficult ground indeed. Two steam engines are not sufficient to keep the foundations dry and pump out the spring waters which collect here from all the surrounding hills. Underneath the space reserved for the bell tower, and nineteen feet below the level of the Babuino, a handsome group of antique bronzes was found on September 18th. The workmen carried off many pieces, and sold them to Scalabrini, the dealer in antiquities opposite; they were soon after seized by the trustees of the new church. The most remarkable fragments are the head of a bronze statue, larger than life size, which is thought to represent Augustus, and to have some connexion with the mausoleum of that emperor; a mask, with the eyes perforated through; the profile of another head; and many other pieces of less consequence. They have suffered great injuries, either from fire or from the secular exposure to the action of water.

The Tiberine Museum was opened to the public on Monday, November 15th. It comprises four halls and a garden. In the garden are kept the remains of the Pons Valentinianus, of its parapets, of its inscriptions, of the triumphal arch which stood as a titulus de pont on the cis-Tiberine side. Within the halls are exposed the set of paintings found in the Farnesina grounds, the set of stucco ceilings found in the same place, the bronze statues, the coins, the marbles, the potteries, the miscellaneous bric-à-brac found within the bed of the river, and the inscriptions, urns, statues, and busts found in the tomb of G. Sulpicius Platorinus.

The Ministry of Public Instruction has taken possession of the vineyards and gardens which occupy the site of the Baths of Titus. As soon as the legal formalities are over, the place, turned pro tempore into a promenade, and ready for future excavations, will be thrown open to the public. The same thing has been done with the baths of Caracalla. The ministry has bought the whole space of ground between the main building and the piscina. It will be arranged as a public promenade.

The winter campaign was opened simultaneously at Ostia and at Hadrian's Villa with the last days of October. As regards Hadrian's Villa, I am glad to state that the discovery of its noble monuments will not interfere with the preservation of its groves of olive trees, cypress, and stately pines. The utmost care is bestowed by the excavators in dealing gently with the trees, which, according to the opinion of many, are nearly as charming and beautiful as the ruins themselves. As a rule, any tree interfering with the progress of the excavations is transplanted to a more secure spot. The usefulness of these proceedings is easy to understand. Hadrian's Villa was not a mere group of buildings, neither a plain park in the modern acceptance of the words. It was a park thickly covered with imitations of the most famous buildings of the Roman world, which, accordingly, were separated one from the other by thickets of trees, flower gardens, lawns, &c. It is easy to understand that the system followed by the authorities in clearing the ruins of the villa will restore to the place its original character and its manifold attractions. The programme for the winter campaign contemplates the discovery of the group of buildings between the Vale of Tempe on the east, the Pincile and the Canossum on the west. This space is occupied mainly by the private apartments of the emperor and by that round portico which is called in guide-books "teatro marittimo." Whatever this building may have been, certainly it was one of the most sumptuous. Every bit of marble found in the excavations of the teatro is being restored to its original place—of course, whenever this place is known beyond doubt. Eight columns of the Ionic order, with their capitals and entablature, have been raised; five more are waiting to be raised. Columns among ruins are just like figures in a landscape—they vivify it, they make it alive and cheerful. After wandering through the solitudes of the villa, the silence of which is faintly broken by the distant voice of the "preceps Anio," and through ivy-clad ruins, shapeless and nameless, which are more picturesque than interesting, one feels most pleasantly surprised and charmed with the aspect of this lovely building, with its rows of columns, exquisitely cut capitals and friezes, marble pavements, &c.

The programme for Ostia contemplates the discovery of the whole quarter of the town between the theatre and the temple of Vulcan. The first cartload of rubbish was removed from the caves of the theatre on the morning of October 29th, at nightfall of the same day the following monuments had been discovered:—A marble pedestal, six feet high, with a long inscription in honour of a Marcus Licinius Privatus, a town councillor, who had presented his fellow citizens with the handsome sum of fifty thousand aestertii. He was quæstor of the Corporation of the Bakers from Ostia and Porto, and president of the Company of Carpenters (fabri lignarii); another pedestal with two inscriptions (the one on the front will never be read because the block of marble has been built into one of the pilasters of the theatre; the one on the side contains the date of the dedication of the pedestal, the 19th of September, A.D. 173, under the consulship of Severus and Pompeianus); a life-size statue of a magistrate, very likely of the same Marcus Licinius Privatus; and many fragments of less consequence.

The slopes of the Tusculan Hills, facing Rome and the Campagna, were more densely crowded with villas in ancient times than they are now. This difference is easily understood. Aristocratic families were then more numerous and wealthy; they cherished their native land; travelling abroad in summer was more difficult than pleasant; the country around Rome was then more healthy and fit for summer residence than it is now. The lowest of modern villas at Frascati, the Pallavicini, although built at a height of 303 m. above the sea, is subject to malaria from June to October. In ancient times the salubrious region began at a height of 100 m., thus affording an immensely wider space for summer residences. The villa of the Cæcili, now called I Grottoni, stands at 132 m.; the beautiful villas called Cisternole, S. Matteo, Bevilacqua, &c., range between 100 and 200 m. above the sea. To this lower region, actually saturated with malarious spores, belongs the villa of the Emperor Galba, the ruins of which ought to be better known and more frequently visited by the student or the tourist. They cover a wide space east of the railway station of Frascati. The piscina of this villa is one of the largest in Latium. It is 120 feet square, 30 feet deep, divided into six galleries by five rows of pilasters, and holds 70,000 cubic feet of water. Such capacity was not deemed sufficient for the wants of the place. Another reservoir, 135 feet long, 42 feet wide, was added close by, thus bringing the storage of winter water for summer purposes to 130,000 cubic feet. Between the piscina and the palace a lead pipe was found in 1705, inscribed, "Felix arkarus imp. Sergii Galbae," a document which leaves no doubt as to the site of the villa, mentioned twice by Suetonius, in chapters iv. and xviii. of Galba's life. The imperial palace stood where stands now the "Campitelli" farmhouse—a perfect labyrinth of reticulated walls, with mosaic or marble pavements, niches for statues, fountains, &c. On the hill called Floriano are remains of other buildings, enclosed by a wall 2,000 feet long. Here, some months ago, a crypto-porticus was discovered, with stucco bas-reliefs, on the ceiling of the finest workmanship. They represent panoplies of Roman and Eastern weapons, crowns of laurel and oak, sea monsters, and other miscellaneous subjects. I have mentioned this "Tusculanum" of Galba because it will be explored and searched in a scientific way in the course of the winter, and because of its connexion with the history of malaria, the summer plague of the Campagna. Two things are absolutely certain: first, that the site of the villa is now utterly unhealthy, and subject to the influence of pernicious fevers from June to October; secondly, that in ancient times it was healthy and fit for a summer staying. Suetonius tells plainly that Galba æstivare consuevit in this place, which it would have been foolish to do unless its hygienic condition were altogether different.

The same thing may be said as regards Hadrian's villa at Tibur, Geta's at Beccane, M. Aurelius's at Castel di Guido, Commodus's at S. Maria Nuova, and so on. Pliny says that the juventutis of his Laurentine villa at Tor Paterno (the most pestilential district of the "ora maritima") was maior æstare than in winter. Would the most eccentric of our patricians or financiers ever think of building a villa, worth some millions, in the open Campagna? We may fairly assume that the hygienic state of Latium was, if not normal, certainly better under the empire than it is now. In the second place, considering that the nature of the soil has not changed since the sub-Apennine period, we may state that our fathers had done something which actually prevented the annual outbreak of malaria, or at least diminished its violence. Let us find out what that something was; let us do the same, taking advantage of our skill in chemistry and mechanics; the results cannot fail.

SALES.

Messrs. SOTHERBY, WILKINSON & HODGE dispersed last week a collection of coins and medals formed by a nobleman. Most of the specimens in the cabinet were in a fine state of preservation, but more especially the English and Scotch, which were considered unusually good. The following are some of the higher prices realized. Greek silver:—Metapontum, tetradrachm. obs., head of Ulysses with helmet and quadriga on the top; rev., an ear of wheat, 62s. Syracuse, the medallion, usual type 48s. 10s. English gold:—Henry VII. sovereign: obs., the king seated on his throne, holding a sceptre; rev., full-blown rose with the French arms in the centre, 26s. 10s. Henry VIII. pound sovereign, struck in the thirty-fourth year of his reign: obs., king seated on his throne; rev., the arms of England, 34s. George noble: obs., St. George on horseback killing the dragon; rev., a ship with a rose on the mast, 34l. Edward VI. sovereign of his third year: obv., king seated on state chair; rev., the royal arms, 25l. 10s. Double sovereign, or a pattern for 3l.: obv., king seated on his throne with a portcullis under his feet; rev., the full-blown double rose and shield of arms; m.m. on both sides a dragon's head, 175l. Queen Mary rial: obv., the queen holding a sword and shield of arms, standing in a ship; rev., a sun in the centre of eight arches, 68l. Elizabeth rial: obv., the queen in a ship; rev., a sun and lions, 18l. James I. spur rial: obv., the king armed in a ship with a rose at the side; rev., rose and sun in treasure of eight arches, 15l. 10s. Fifteen-shilling piece: obv., the Scottish lion sejant; rev., rose and sun, 27l. Angel: obv., angel; rev., a ship, 17l. Charles I. unit: obv., bust in armour with short hair; rev., shield of arms, 21l. Anne five-guinea piece, 1705, 14l. George III. pattern two-guinea piece, 1788, 12l. 15s. George IV., William IV., and Victoria, a complete set of the coins of each sovereign, struck in the years 1826, 1831, 1839, realized respectively 19l., 15l. 15s., 14l. 15s. English silver:—Elizabeth, a set of the portcullis money; obv., arms crowned; rev., a portcullis crowned, 36l. 3s. 6d. Charles I. twenty-shilling piece struck at Oxford: obv., king on horseback, 1842, 13l. Siege pieces:—Rebel half-crown: obv., a plain cross, 11l. 15s. Rebel crown of the same type, 10l. 10s. Beeston shilling, an irregularly-shaped piece with a castle stamped on it, 20l. Scarborough crown, a quadrangular piece of plate stamped with a castle, 30l. Scarborough half-crown, an oblong piece with a castle, 15l. 5s. Scarborough two-shilling, of a very irregular form, 12l. 5s. Scarborough one shilling and ninepence, a plate stamped with a castle, 15l. 17s. 6d. Scarborough sixpence of the same type, 10l. Colchester shilling, an octagon stamped with a castle, 15l. 10s. Dublin crown, 17l. Dublin half-crown, 13l. Victoria, nine proof florins of various types, struck in the year 1848, 21l. 10s. Scotch coins:—Malcolm III. silver penny: obv., the king's full face; rev., cross fleury, 27l. David I. silver penny: obv., king's profile; rev., plain cross, an unpublished coin, 22l. Alexander II. silver penny: obv., bare head; rev., a double cross, 16l. David II. silver groat: obv., profile and a sceptre; rev., a cross with a mullet in each angle, 22l. Gold noble: obv., the king standing in a ship with a sword and shield; rev., a cross fleury in eight curves, 81l. James II. gold St. Andrew: obv., St. Andrew; rev., arms, 27l. 10s. James VI. silver forty-shilling piece: obv., three-quarter bust with a sword; rev., the arms crowned, 30l. 10s. Gold, two-thirds of a lion: obv., a lion seated, holding a sword, 35l. 10s. The sale produced 3,958l. 10s.

The same firm sold, on the 20th inst., a small collection of Rembrandt's etchings formed by an amateur. The sale comprised only 165 lots, but nearly every etching was in a good state, and had formerly been in some celebrated collection. The sale produced 1,804l. 1s. 6d. The following are the highest prices realized.—The Adoration of the Shepherds, second state, on india paper, 25l. The Flight into Egypt, from the Schloesser collection, 35l. The "Ecce Homo," third state, from the Edails collection, 39l. The Descent from the Cross, second state, from the Debois collection, 45l. Christ Entombed, first state, 25l. St. Jerome, second state, from the Leackrunk and Schloesser collections, 68l. St. Francis Praying, second state, 29l. The Persian, second state, 27l. The Flute-Player, second state, from the De Fries collection, 28l. The Woman with the Arrow, second state, 28l. Six's Bridge, second state, from the Schloesser collection, 37l. A Peasant carrying Milk-Pails, second state, with margin, 44l. 10s. A Village near the High Road, fourth state, and with a square margin, 60l. A Landscape with a ruined tower, third state, from the Cannenburg collection, 35l. A Cottage with white pales, second state, 28l. 10s. John Lutma, third state, from the Knowles collection, 34l. Ephraim Bonus, second state, 41l. 10s. John Cornelius Sylvius, from the Schloesser collection, 34l. 10s. The Burgomaster Six, third state, from the La Motte Fouquet collection, 30l.

Fine-Art Society.

A COLLECTION, nearly fifty in number, of the works of the late Mr. Dodgson will be shown at the Winter Exhibition of the Water-Colour Society.

THE Society of British Artists has issued cards of invitation to the private view of its Winter Exhibition, which is appointed for to-day (Saturday), at the gallery in Suffolk Street.

SIX cases of antiquities have arrived at the British Museum from the excavations at Babylon. They consist chiefly of inscribed tablets and small objects. With them is a Phœnician inscription.

THE discovery of a Roman villa at Brading, in the Isle of Wight, which has more than once been the subject of communications in our columns, will be brought before the Society of Antiquaries on Thursday next. A committee having been formed, composed mainly of resident landowners in the neighbourhood of the villa and of Fellows of the Society of Antiquaries, the Report of that Committee will be read to the Society by the Director, Mr. H. S. Milman. The Report will be accompanied by an exhibition of plans and drawings, as well as of the actual objects found during the excavations, which have been collected with great care by the assiduous labours of Mr. J. H. Price and Mr. J. E. Price, to whose energy and ability the public are indebted for the preservation of these remains. The Council of the Society of Antiquaries has subscribed 20l. towards the excavations.

STUDENTS and collectors will be glad to hear that Mr. Reid has undertaken to produce during his next vacation a catalogue of the extraordinarily numerous and choice collection of prints in the Duke of Devonshire's library at Chatsworth, which is one of the finest gatherings of the kind, and has never yet been thoroughly searched, still less described.

THE building in course of erection in Manchester for the School of Art is, we hear, progressing rapidly, the exterior being finished. The Earl of Derby, it is anticipated, will take part at the opening of the edifice next mid-summer.

MR. G. R. TUNN, a son of the late Mr. Tunn, the anatomist, died lately in Monte Video. He painted the first picture for the new Town Hall in Manchester, "The Reception by the Sultan in Buckingham Palace of the Corporation of Manchester." In Turkey he had painted local genre subjects, and at Monte Video, where he had lately gone, he was busy with portraits and with Argentine scenes. He is stated to have died of apoplexy, brought on by the heat of the climate.

M. GUILLAUME, the famous French sculptor, is carving a statue of Bossuet for the Château de Chantilly, of which critics write in terms of high admiration.

COUNT ZORZI, whose brochure on the restoration of St. Mark's we referred to last week, is about to publish an illustrated work on the monuments of Venice.

M. ST. MARCEAU, who obtained the Prix du Salon, 1879, is designing and sculpturing a cup destined as the prize for the races at Longchamps, 1881.

MR. E. BURNE JONES desires us to say that his design, "The Parable of the Boiling Pot," which is included in "Dalziel's Bible," a work we recently noticed, was made sixteen or eighteen years ago.

THE new Fine-Art Society at Simla, to which we referred a short time since, promises to be a success. It already numbers forty members, of whom many are natives of distinction. Amongst the latter is the Gaekwar of Baroda.

IT is well known that a large number of monumental brasses were sold as old metal soon after the fall of the western tower of Hereford Cathedral in 1786. Some of them were purchased by that able antiquary John Gough, who visited Hereford soon after that event, and they remained in his family until recently. The late Mr. John Gough Nichols inherited them, and expressed a wish to restore them. But in consequence of his death difficulties arose in carrying out his design. Through the assistance of Mr. Stephen Tucker, Somerset Herald, no fewer than forty fragments have been secured from the walls of Mr. Nichols's house in Parliament Street, and have been entrusted to Prebendary Havergal, who has removed them to Hereford Cathedral. There are two fine effigies, several inscriptions, eight shields, and several small figures and fragments from the fine brass of Precentor Porter, who was also Warden of New College, Oxford, all in a good state of preservation. It is proposed to secure the brasses to the walls of the north-east transept (the original matrices being lost or destroyed), with a record in brass of this interesting restoration. Full details will be given in Mr. Havergal's volume, now ready for the press, on the "Monumental Inscriptions in the Cathedral Church of Hereford." The Prebendary will, no doubt, not fail to notice the success which attended the restoration of the famous brass called "The Gorleston Knight" to its matrix in Gorleston Church, near Great Yarmouth. This work, after a separation from its place lasting, we believe, nearly a hundred years, was recognized in a dealer's shop, recovered by Dawson Turner, and replaced in the slab, and now stands against the wall of the church.

HERE is a characteristic anecdote of Constable, sent by a correspondent whose father sat to Constable:—"My father, who was something of an invalid in 1829, found himself seated on a bank under a tree, with his hat by his side, during a sharp shower, and rallied Mr. Constable about the background. 'Anybody,' Constable answered, 'could paint your portrait, Mr. Lee; no one but myself could paint that sky; and the picture will prove of value when there is no one living who has known you.'"

THE Sunday visitors to the Royal Institution, Manchester, augment in number, last Sunday showing a considerable increase. More than 3,000 were admitted, most of them being decently clad artisans and boys.

MR. J. B. ATKINSON, whose "Schools of Modern Art in Germany" we noticed lately, desires to say that it is more than a reprint of articles in the Portfolio, and contains additional engravings and woodcuts.

THE new National Gallery of Art was opened at Sydney on Wednesday, September 22nd last, with ceremonies worthy of the event. The Trustees of the Academy of Art have secured commodious galleries, parts of the building erected for the late International Exhibition, and by buying works of art they have more than doubled the value of their collection of examples. In the first room are water-colour drawings. In the large room are many pictures, including a work of Mr. Madox Brown's, by English, French, and Belgian artists. Autotypes, prints and etchings, statuary and casts occupy other parts of the building. The site is beautiful, overlooking the Botanical Gardens and the best part of the city.

Among the objects recently added to the Musée de Cluny are, says the Chronique des Arts, several fine works acquired at the late San Donato sale. In the great hall, where the drawings of Viollet-le-Duc were exhibited, has been erected a fine chimney-piece of carved stone of the sixteenth century, decorated with a bas-relief of the Casa Santa of Loreto; near it is a ceiling of sculptured wood, brought from an ancient house at Rouen. From the Hôtel Dieu at Auxerre has been removed to the Musée de Cluny a fine tapestry in four pieces, representing incidents in the life of St. Stephen, which was given to the cathedral at Auxerre by Bishop J. Bailler in the later part of the fifteenth century. Sold out of the cathedral, this valuable example was secured by the Hôtel Dieu, which has now ceded it to the nation. That curious and numerous collection of shoes of all times and countries, to which we recently referred as having been formed by Jules Jacquemart, has been placed in the same museum, having been bought on inadequate terms for this place, according to the wish of the artist who gathered it. M. Sommerard's catalogue of the treasures under his charge is nearly ready for publication.

The results of the renewed excavations at Olympia have proved more fruitful than was expected. Much has been discovered relating to the internal arrangement of the Temple of Zeus. A fragment of the statue of Theseus belonging to the western pediment has been recovered.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Various Operas.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Berlioz's 'Faust'; The Popular Concerts.

As the production of Signor Tito Mattei's opera 'Maria di Gand' occurred too late for notice in this week's Athenæum, we have only to record a few changes of cast at Her Majesty's Theatre, scarcely needing more than formal mention. Mdlle. de Bressolles replaced Mdlle. Widmar as Rosina in 'Il Barbiere' on Friday week, and rendered more justice to the music, though there was but little charm in her impersonation. On Monday Mdlle. Isidor essayed the rôle of Marguerite in 'Faust,' and acquitted herself tolerably well without making any special impression. Her best effort was in the prison scene of the fifth act. 'Il Trovatore' was played on Tuesday for the first time this season, with Madame Colombo, Madame Amadi, Signor Manfrini, and Signor Aldighieri in the principal characters.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert may be dismissed with but few lines of criticism, the novelties being comparatively of subordinate interest. An orchestral piece, entitled 'The Sentinel,' by Ferdinand Huller, arranged, it is said, from a set of military pieces for the piano, pleased greatly and gained an encore. It is but a little cabinet picture, but far more effective than many works of greater pretensions with which we have been oppressed from time to time. Two excerpts from Berlioz's 'La Prise de Troi,' the companion work to his great opera, 'Les Troyens à Carthage,' made no remarkable impression. They were a Pas des Lutteurs (Dance of Wrestlers) and a Marche Triomphale, both scored with all the French composer's wealth of colour, but containing comparatively little freshness of idea. The symphony was Haydn's in a flat, No. 4 of the Salomonset, a work thoroughly familiar to musicians. The performance of a portion of Beethoven's music to 'Egmont' suggested the idea that the visit of the Meiningen Dramatic Company next season would offer a favourable opportunity for a hearing of Goethe's tragedy with the Bonn master's incidental music. Madame Frickenhaus's rendering of Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro gioioso, Op. 43, was neat and unpretentious, but not striking in any respect. The vocalists at this concert did not give unqualified satisfaction. Madame Sophie Löwe was not in possession of her usual powers, and Madame Isabel Fassett, a mezzo-soprano from the United States, afforded evidence of the imperfect cultivation of her voice.

Berlioz's great work, 'La Damnation de Faust,' was noticed at such length when it was produced at St. James's Hall, under Mr. Charles Halle's direction, in May last (Athenæum, No. 2744), that it is not requisite to refer again in detail to its striking merits. Although the public at that time showed some indifference towards it, there was no rashness in assuming its eventual popularity. Music so full of original and taking melody, so conspicuous for breadth, humour, and freshness, and so splendidly orchestrated must make its way, and it would seem that interest has already replaced apathy, for there was an overflowing audience at St. James's Hall last Saturday evening, and the performance is announced for repetition on the 11th prox. In one important respect an adverse comparison was inevitable between the rendering of last week and that of six months since. It will be remembered that, in order to give the fullest effect to the work, Mr. Halle obtained the aid of his choir from Manchester on the earlier occasion. This exceptional enterprise could not, of course, be maintained, and the choral force last week consisted for the most part of the members of Mr. Leslie's disbanded choir. Totally unused to music of this kind, these singers were placed in a somewhat false position, and under the circumstances they acquitted themselves remarkably well. But the immense verve and spirit of the Lancashire choristers were sadly missed. Several of the numbers went smoothly and correctly, and that is about the highest praise that can be given. Regarding the principals, Miss Mary Davies and Mr. Edward Lloyd resumed the parts of Marguerite and Faust, Mr. Pyatt replaced Mr. Hilton as Brander, and Mr. Santley sang the music of Mephistopheles, in place of Herr Heneschel. The latter change was for the better, in respect of vocal charm, and refinement of style. Mr. Halle's orchestra was as praiseworthy as ever, with the reservations which it is generally necessary to make as regards this body of instrumentalists.

The Popular Concert of Monday evening was one of most unusual importance for those who feel a sincere interest in the development of native musical art. We are accustomed to draw our supply of instrumental performers of high rank so steadily and undeviatingly from abroad, that the first appearance of a new English pianist is a noteworthy event, if only for its rarity. But in the present instance there are further reasons why last Monday should be considered a red-letter day in the annals of English music. If the South Kensington National Training School should prefer no other claim on our sympathies, it can at least boast of having nurtured one of the most promising young musicians of the time. Mr. Eugene D'Albert is the Queen's Scholar at Kensington. This is not a mere coincidence, as some have been led to suppose, for the royal scholarship chanced to become vacant, and Mr. D'Albert, as the most gifted pupil in the school, was promoted to the position. At the students' concerts some foretaste of his exceptional gifts has been displayed, but Monday was virtually his first public appearance before a critical and representative audience. A pianist intent upon manifesting his executive capacity in the most prominent light could not select a more fitting work than Schumann's 'Études Symphoniques,' Op. 13. The difficulties of the composition are insurmountable except to performers of the highest calibre, and Mr. D'Albert's easy mastery of the mechanical portion of his task was therefore in itself no mean accomplishment. But the intellectual grasp over his subject shown by this lad—for he is as yet only halfway through his teens—was still more pleasing to observe. It would be an exaggeration to say that Schumann's extraordinary ideas were interpreted with uniform success throughout. Some of the variations did not receive full justice, while others—notably No. 9 and No. 11—could scarcely have been given more effectively. Taking the performance as a whole, it has only been exceeded within our remembrance by those of Madame Schumann and Herr Rabinstein, and it will be acknowledged that this is very high praise indeed. We have still to make the acquaintance of Mr. D'Albert as a composer, in which branch of his art it is understood he exhibits equal promise. Monday's concert, apart from this interesting début, contained nothing of special significance; Mozart's Serenade in c minor, for wind instruments, and Beethoven's Sonata in a, Op. 69, for pianoforte and violoncello, were the concerted works, and Miss Leonora Braham, who gave great satisfaction, was the vocalist.

Musical Society.

MDLLE. JAYOTHA gave a pianoforte recital in St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon. Her programme was, unfortunately, so devoid of interest that the occasion attracted but little attention. Beethoven's Sonata Pastorale, Op. 28, and Mendelssohn's Fantasia in f sharp minor, Op. 28, were the works of largest calibre, but the Polish pianist was most successful in Chopin's Nocturne in c sharp minor, which she played with much poetic charm. The recital lasted barely an hour.

MR. JOHN P. JACKSON'S forthcoming work 'Lohengrin, Musically and Pictorially Illustrated,' will form No. 1 of 'The Illustrated Opera Series,' to be published in about ten days by Mr. Bogue. In it he has given the text of Richard Wagner's dramatic poem, 'The Legend of the Swan Knight,' and full-page illustrations by celebrated German artists. He has given all the principal musical pieces for voice and piano. The work will make sixty-four pages.

THE Cambridge University Musical Society, assisted by other choirs in the town, announced a performance of Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' on Thursday last, to which especial interest was attached from the fact that the composer's own trombone parts, published for the first time some years since in the German Handel Society's edition, were used. The same Society purposes next May to perform, under the direction of Mr. Stanford, Mr. Hubert Parry's 'Prometheus Unbound,' which was produced at the Gloucester Festival in September last.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association gave its first concert for the present season at Shoreditch Town Hall last Tuesday evening, under the direction of Mr. Ebenezer Prout. The principal works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' Schumann's 'Nachtlied' (first performance in England), and Mrs. Meadows-White's 'Ode to the North-East Wind.' The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Clara West, and Mr. Henry Guy.

THE appointment of Mr. Frederick Corder as conductor of the music at the Brighton Aquarium, which was announced in these columns some months ago, is already beginning to bear fruit. The directors now announce a first series of four classical orchestral concerts, to be given on Saturday afternoons. From the programmes which have been forwarded to us, the concerts appear to be modelled upon those of the Crystal Palace, without, however, falling into the too common mistake of undue length. The chief works announced are the following: Symphonies, Beethoven in c minor, Mendelssohn's Italian, Raff's 'Lenore,' and Schubert in a minor; Overtures, 'The Naiads' (Bennett), 'Oberon,' 'William Tell,' and 'Tannhäuser'; Concertos, &c., Mendelssohn in a minor (violin) and c minor (piano), Liszt's 'Fantasie Hongroise'; Miscellaneous, Corder's ballet music from 'Morte d'Arthur,' the 'Danse des Sylphes' and 'Rakoczy March' from Berlioz's 'Damnation de Faust,' Wagner's 'Siegfried-Idyll,' Gounod's 'Funeral March of a Marionette,' and Saint-Saëns's 'Le Rouet d'Omphale.' The orchestra is to be largely increased, and soloists of eminence are engaged for each concert. We trust that this excellent enterprise will be as warmly supported as it deserves. The first concert is to take place this afternoon.

THE Norwich Musical Festival, which is to be held next year, has been fixed to take place during the week commencing Monday, October 10th. Signor Randegger will be the conductor.

THE Acock's Green Musical Society, numbering about sixty voices, is preparing for performance, with orchestral accompaniments, E. J. Loder's opera 'The Night Dancers.'

AFTER our going to press last week it was announced that, owing to the indisposition of M. Faure, the first performance of M. Duvernoy's 'Tempête' had been postponed. The work was given at the Châtelet Theatre last Wednesday afternoon, with the cast of soloists already mentioned in our columns, under the direction of M. Colonne.

THE two fine tenors mentioned in Hart's 'History of the Violin,' p. 113, together with a violin and a chamber double-bass, made by Gaspard de Salo, have been recently sold by auction by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson, and produced the sums of 76*l.*, 91*l.*, 41*l.*, and 21*l.* respectively. They were the property of the late Dr. Steward, of Wolverhampton.

Mlle. MARIE VANZANDT, who has been singing in 'Mignon' with such success at the Paris Opera Comique, is shortly to appear at the same house as Dinorah.

M. ÉTIENNE GIROD, the head of an old established music-publishing firm in Paris, has recently died in that city at the age of fifty-six.

THE WEEK.

PAINTER'S.—Mr. Booth's Appearance in Lord Lytton's 'Richelieu'.
GAIETY (Mathews).—'Captain Cuttle,' a Dramatic Sketch from Dickens in Three Acts.
CRITICISM.—'Where's the Cat?' a Comedy in Three Acts. From the German by James Albery.
FOLLY.—'The Light Fantastic,' an "Absurdity" in One Act. By M. J. Byron.

MR. Booth's Richelieu is an admirably conscientious, thoughtful, and artistic performance. In this character the significance of Mr. Booth's method is revealed, and the reputation it has won for him in the United States becomes comprehensible to the English public. Almost for the first time in recent days the full value of an artistic method has been made apparent by an English-speaking actor to an English audience. Those actors who, like Mr. Irving, Fechter, or even Signor Salvini, have won warmest recognition, have done so apparently on the strength of personal gifts and of a species of magnetic or sympathetic influence, which enabled them to dispense with apparent method and, in certain instances, overleap it. In the case of Signor Salvini, what looked like nature was probably an outcome of highest art; with Mr. Irving, and in a certain degree with Fechter, what was best was a direct outcome of individuality. Through a direct inspiration Mr. Irving attained the really splendid effect which is witnessed in 'Hamlet' when he springs, after the play scene, into the throne vacated by the king, or that not less fine effect in 'Richelieu' when, after the departure of the baffled murderers, he puts his head through the curtains of his bedroom. By much slower, and it may be surer, processes Mr. Booth reaches a result not less fine. To use an illustration which is highly honouring to both actors, while Mr. Irving, like Mr. Swinburne, seems to have what is best in him as a possession, Mr. Booth, like Mr. Matthew Arnold, seems to show that what is regarded as inspiration may come as a result of labour.

MR. Booth's Richelieu is a sustained and an exquisite performance. At one or two points it displays electrical passion, and it is throughout admirable in finish. Those passages in which Richelieu confronts the cowering minion of the king and defies him to touch the woman around whom is thrown the protection of the Church are naturally the favourites with the playgoer. Far higher, however, than the merit of these passages is that of the grace, beauty, and completeness of the whole. There were no points and few effects. All that was seen was the fierce, subtle, and indomitable prelate in the very guise in which he has been conceived by Lord Lytton. The appearance was singularly like the best-known pictures of Richelieu, and the character of the astute, unscrupulous man was presented to the life. The support afforded Mr. Booth was singularly and painfully inadequate. Mr. Ryder was a burly Capuchin and Miss Gerard a pretty Julie de Mortemar. In the part of Joseph there is, however, little demand upon an actor, and to the requirements of Julie Miss Gerard showed herself wholly inadequate. Her voice is weak and thin, and her whole performance never gets beyond prettiness. Except the François of Mr. W. Younge there was nothing in the remaining characters which calls for praise, and one or two performances were discreditable to English art.

Very poor stuff is the adaptation from 'Dombey and Son' which, under the name of 'Captain Cuttle,' has been given at the Gaiety. Three acts, each including half-a-dozen scenes, serve to bring upon the stage a score of the principal characters in 'Dombey and Son,' and to indicate a kind of action which is comprehensible to those only who retain vivid recollections of the novel. Without such familiarity the whole is meaningless. Mr. John Brougham, by whom the adaptation has been made, has apparently had two ideas—to crowd into a species of dramatic picture as many of the best-known characters as his canvas can hold, and then to place Capt. Cuttle in the centre. It is fortunate for the experiment that Mr. Florence's Capt. Cuttle is admirably comic and unctuous. Not altogether deficient in pathos is it. In one scene, indeed, a distinct vein of sympathy is opened out. Ripe drollery is, however, its chief characteristic, and this renders the whole performance irresistible. Some attempt is made to realize the extenuations of such well-known characters as Mr. Dombey, Carker, Toots, Florence, Walter, and the like. With the exception of Jack Bunsby, however, Mrs. Skewton, Susan Nipper, and Rob the Grinder, the resemblances did not extend beyond externals.

To investigate the causes which have led in England to the substitution of farce for comedy as the most popular form of dramatic entertainment, and to the gradual abandonment of all that constitutes the strength and the raison d'être of the drama, is a task for the historian or the sociologist rather than the critic. That the class of pieces set before the public becomes lighter and flimsier with each successive year, and that the limits of the empire of nonsense are continually widened at the expense of the empire of common sense, are facts which must strike the most casual observer. To explain a phenomenon which is as familiar as daylight would, however, need a series of processes at every one of which opposition would be challenged. It remains only to say that the week's contribution of novelty belongs to the most trivial forms of what, by courtesy or through inadequacy of phrase, is termed art. 'Where's the Cat?' which has been produced at the Criterion, may be held to occupy in regard to pieces of its class the position among his fellows assigned to Shadwell by Dryden:—

The rest to some faint meaning make pretences,
But Shadwell never deviates into canes.

A piece more hopelessly nonsensical has never perplexed and amused an audience. In the fact that amusement is afforded the vindication of the play is supplied. The amusement, moreover, which is obtained is harmless, since, though rather startling propositions are advanced, the spectator who, sitting in the light, sees others in darkness, knows that the apparent recklessness of speech is, in fact, the result of bewilderment. A large portion of the hold upon the audience which the play possesses is attributable to a capable interpretation. Besides collecting a company which, so far as regards the performance of farce, could not easily be surpassed on the Continent, the management of the

LYCEUM THEATRE.

SOLE LINGERER AND MANAGER, MR. HENRY IRVING.
'THE CORNICIAN BROTHERS' Every Night at 8.30. 20.10. and 21.10.
FABIAN DEL FRANCHI. MR. IRVING. AT 7.30. BYRONIAN.
Drama opens at 7.15. DRESSING PERFORMANCES OF 'THE CORNICIAN BROTHERS' SATURDAY, November 27th, and SUNDAY, November 28th, at 7.30. Drama opens at 7.15. Box Office (Mr. Maudsley) open 10 to 6. Seats booked by 10.00 or 10.15.

Criterion insists upon adequate rehearsals, and gives a first representation a briskness and a completeness which, until within recent years, were unknown in England. The general cast with which 'Where's the Cat?' is presented is excellent, and such performances as those of Mr. Hill and Mrs. John Wood are altogether admirable. Mr. Wyndham has a kind of bustling energy which, when accompanied as it is with a stolid gravity maintained under the most preposterous conditions, is thoroughly ludicrous. Mr. Giddens is developing into a genuine comedian, and Miss Eastlake is an excellent ingenue. It might almost be maintained that the preposterous farce to which this piece belongs serves a purpose, since it compels our young actors to get out of that species of amateurish quietude which is now too common on the stage. We fear to state how large a proportion of modern actors are no more than fairly competent and intelligent amateurs.

Two lines from the 'MacFlecknoe' of Dryden have served to describe the farcical comedy which Mr. Albery translated from the German for the use of Mr. Wyndham at the Criterion; a third line from the same poem may be applied to the dramatic trifle with which Mr. Byron has supplied Mr. Toole at the Folly. In this Mr. Byron has shown once more his possession of the art to Torture one poor word ten thousand ways. There is in 'The Light Fantastic' scarcely a pretence of a plot, and the piece is nothing more than a framework to bear the largest possible quantity of puns. Mr. Toole, in this piece emphatically himself, speaks these verbal pleasantries in such a manner as to assign them their full point, and delivers a lecture upon Terpsichore which, though more than a little strained, is mirthful. Mr. Toole's performance constitutes the piece, the remaining roles making slight demands upon the exponents.

Dramatic Gossip.

Mr. Booth's next appearances will take place in 'Othello' and 'The Fool's Revenge.'

TOMLIN'S comedy, 'The Honeymoon,' was revived on Wednesday at a Gaiety Matinée. Miss Hilton as Juliana shows promise, but requires study and practice. Mr. Beveridge was fairly successful as the Duke. The general performance was not entitled to rank above amateur effort.

M. CHARLY, who was well known for his performances of villains at the Porte Saint Martin and the Ambigu, has died in hospital. So associated with parts of this class was he that he recalls Sandford, of whom Colley Cibber tells that the attempt to present him as an honest man resulted in the audience damning the play in which he appeared, as though "the author had imposed upon them the most frontless or incredible absurdity." The last character M. Charly created was the Duc d'Albe in 'Patrie.'

'MICHAEL STROGOFF,' the spectacular piece extracted by M. d'Ennery from a novel of M. Jules Verne, has had a complete success at the Châtelet. Madame Marie Laurent distinguishes herself in a principal rôle. The remarkable gifts of M. Dailly are lost, so far as the English public is concerned, in his attempt to exhibit an English journalist. M. Marais plays the hero. A version of 'Michael Strogoff' will shortly be produced at the Adelphi.

PRE-HISTORIC EUROPE: a Geological Sketch.

Medium 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 2s.

"The object of these pages is to give an outline of what appear to have been the most considerable physical changes experienced in our continent since the beginning of the Pliocene or Quaternary period. Several general works, by some of our most accomplished geologists and archaeologists, have already dealt with the subject in part, but none quite cover the ground I have endeavoured to occupy. While some of my predecessors have examined the evidence principally from the point of view of the archaeologist, and others from that of the paleontologist, my aim has been to describe in a more systematic manner than has hitherto been attempted the succession of changes, climatic and geographical, which, taken together, constitute the historical geology of Pliocene, Post-glacial, and recent times."—Extract from Preface.

FOURTH EDITION, Revised, embodying the Reports of the Royal Coal Commission.

Demy 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations.

"This edition has been largely rewritten. It contains an entirely new chapter on Carboniferous Plants, kindly drawn up by Professor Williamson, F.R.S., of Manchester. The classification of the Carboniferous Series of Beds has been modified in accordance with the views enunciated in my paper on this subject, read before the Geological Society of London in 1877. The account of the various coal-fields has been modified in accordance with more recent investigations as far as my information extends, and the statistical portions have been brought down to the date of 1878."—Extract from Preface.

Dr. Thompson has travelled and retraversed the scenes which he describes, and in this volume we have the ripe result of careful observation for nearly fifty years.

The pictorial illustrations are especially new, prepared specially for this work from photographs taken by the Author and from original drawings. They have been drawn and engraved under his superintendence by artists in London, Paris, and New York.

"The volume incorporates the most valuable results of modern research and discovery with the keen, accurate, and practical observations of one who has spent a lifetime in the country itself."—Record, Nov. 3, 1880.

Just published, small 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

OUR NEXT-DOOR NEIGHBOUR. By STALLA AUSTIN, Author of 'Pat,' 'Stumps,' 'Rags and Tattlers,' &c.

THE LITTLE BLUE LADY, and other Tales. By Mrs. MITCHELL, Author of 'The Beautiful Face,' &c. With Illustrations by C. O. Murray.

THE BEAUTIFUL FACE. By Mrs. MITCHELL. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

"This is a very charming imagination tale. Mrs. Mitchell has treated it with vigour, poetry, and here and there a little humour, which make it very delightful. Every child into whose hands we have put it has been fascinated by it."—Ch. Rev. Quarterly.

CHAPTER RE-ISSUE.—Small 8vo. cloth, gilt edges, 6s.

MORAL SONGS ILLUSTRATED. By Mrs. C. F. ALEXANDER, With 88 Engravings on Wood, from Drawings by E. M. Wimperis, W. H. J. Beet, E. P. Lettich, P. Skelton, Miss E. F. Manning, Miss M. Morris, Miss F. M. Cooper and other Artists. The Illustrations have been arranged and engraved by J. D. Cooper.

"This admirably illustrated edition of a popular book is more than welcome to our library. We have rarely received a work so uniformly excellent."—Art Journal.

HEROES of the CROSS. A Series of Biographical Studies of Saints, Martyrs, and Christian Pioneers. By W. M. DAVENPORT ADAMS. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

"The story is in every case well told. The book is pleasantly written, and conveys in a broad and impartial spirit."—Athenæum.

"No one who reads 'Heroes of the Cross' will be disappointed. Parish libraries will do well to place the book upon their shelves."—Literary Churchman.

Elegantly bound in cloth gilt, 1s. Wrapper, 6d.

GOLD DUST: a Collection of Golden Counsels for the Sanctification of Daily Life. Translated from the French. With Preface by CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

"Gold Dust" is a dainty little book both without and within. It is translated and abridged with great judgment, omitting all that would be unedifying to Anglican readers—perhaps to carry on the analogy, making a brood sitting, so as to retain only the truly pure gold."—Guardian.

Second Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THE FALL of CONSTANTINOPLE; or, Theodora's Passion. By the Rev. J. M. KEALE, D.D.

SECOND EDITION,

AT ALL LIBRARIES and BOOKSELLERS,

THE

LIFE OF SIR ANTHONY PANIZZI, K.C.B.,

Late Principal Librarian of the British Museum, Senator of Italy, &c.

By LOUIS FAGAN.

Two vols. demy 8vo. handsomely bound, with Frontispiece and numerous Illustrations, 25s.

"Mr. Fagan has made good use of the materials bequeathed to him, and has produced a work of great and probably lasting interest."—Athenæum.

"A singularly interesting work."—Daily News.

"Interesting throughout and from every point of view."—Examiner.

"While the portion of Mr. Fagan's volumes devoted to the British Museum will possess the more enduring interest for posterity, their fund of political correspondence and anecdote will be more eagerly scanned by the readers of the day."—St. James's Gazette.

"The life of such a man cannot fail to be full of interest."—Scotsman.

"A valuable contribution to contemporary history, and its value is much enhanced by the many etchings with which it is adorned."—Literary World.

"A Panizzi biography, should Mr. Fagan accomplish his task, would have an importance hardly inferior to any of the works added during this last half-century to the heavily-burdened shelves of our great book repository."—Times.

REMINGTON & Co. 133, New Bond-street, W.

POETS, MUSICIANS, AND DRAMATISTS.—Royal 8vo. cloth, price 14s.

STUDIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ITALY.

By VERNON LEE.

"One of the most fascinating books that it has been our good fortune to meet with for a very long time."—Westminster Review.

"Of the fascination of this work there can be no question."—Daily News.

"We shall be surprised if this eminently suggestive book has not the effect of turning many other inquirers into the same field."—Academy.

"Can be cordially recommended as treating an important and little-known theme with conspicuous ability."—Athenæum.

NEW VERSE.—Crown 8vo. 10 fine Plates, cloth extra, price 6s.

GODS, SAINTS, AND MEN. By Eugene Lee-Hamilton.

"Readers will find him, as before, a Browning without his obscurity."—Graphic.

" quaint, medieval legends and traditions, most of which have a strong flavour of the supernatural, in strong, tuneful, and artistic verse."—Scotsman.

ENLARGED EDITION.—Medium 8vo. price 15s.

THE FOLK-LORE OF THE NORTHERN COUNTIES.

By WILLIAM HENDERSON.

"We congratulate the Folk-Lore Society on the new edition of this excellent book."—Athenæum.
"The new and enlarged edition of an old favourite, the work of a folk-lore student before folk-lore came into vogue as a pursuit, cannot fail to be welcome to the large and increasing number of students who make this interesting subject their principal pursuit. We have here a mass of material, the accumulation of years of search and inquiry. Notes and queries.
"So largely increased by important and valuable additions as to be virtually a new book.... No more dry compilation, but a store of delightful entertainment which is well-nigh inexhaustible."—Daily Telegraph.

MEN OF LIGHT AND LEADING.

EDITED BY

A. J. SYMINGTON.

The aim of the volumes of which this Series is composed is to give an intelligible account of the authors included in it, and of their writings, accompanied with specimens of their works.

While no formal biography is attempted, the details of the life and career of each author are given in sufficient fulness to enable the reader to form a clear conception of the man; and while no attempt has been made to give a complete collection of the writings of any one, a sufficient number of characteristic extracts is given to enable an adequate idea to be formed of the spirit and style of each writer, and the general scope of his works.

The Series will, therefore, it is hoped, be helpful to that large class of readers in every part of the realm who desire to gain a knowledge of our principal authors, but whose leisure precludes the attempt to study elaborate biographies or complete collections of literary works, whether in poetry or prose.

The Volumes will be published in fcap. 8vo. cloth, price 2s. 6d. each.

SECOND EDITION, Revised and Enlarged, crown 8vo. 6s.

GERARD'S MONUMENT, and other POEMS.

"Gerard's Monument" has stopped and held me in the midst of most pressing occupations, as the wedding guest was stopped and held by the eye of the Ancient Mariner."

Lord Lytton.

"I think it a remarkable production, and hope it will be republished here."

Professor H. J. W. Langfellow.

"An original and well-told story, with an entrancing plot.... To a delicate taste and refined feeling is added a high degree of literary skill and genuine imaginative power. Mrs. Pfeiffer pleases palates that scarcely care to quench their thirst with anything less than the nectar of the gods."—Times.

"A picture which Mr. Millais might transmute into canvas and colour."—Spectator.

GLAN ALARCH: his Silence and Song.

"We read it with keen and continuous interest.... It is vigorous in picture, profound in its lessons.... with rare constructive powers and subtle use of metre."—British Quarterly.

"It makes a real addition to our possessions."—Academy.

"A distinct and valuable contribution to modern poetry. Mrs. Pfeiffer has a fair chance of herding with the immortals."—Contemporary Review.

"Passion and strength, and the lines flow on with sweetness and grace."—Spectator.

POEMS. Including the 'Red Lady,' 'Ode to the Teuton Women,' 'The Dark Christmas, 1874,' &c.

"Scarcely a poem which is not full of beauties of thought and expression, and some are masterpieces of lyric poetry."—Scotsman.

"Mrs. Pfeiffer has undoubtedly the true spirit of a singer."—Saturday Review.

"Marked by high imagination."—Pall Mall Gazette.

QUARTERMAN'S GRACE, and other POEMS.

Including 'Madonna Danya,' 'The Vision of Dawn,' and 'Translations from Heine.' 8vo. 5s.

"Nothing could be better than the conception of the young girl Grace. The Heine translations come as near to doing justice to the mingled fancy, wit, and diablerie of Heine as we may expect."—Spectator.

"Madonna Danya" lives within one like an influence."—Geraldine Jewellery.

"Madonna Danya" one is inclined to learn by heart, so as to have it always with one."—Grazer.

LIFE and HER CHILDREN.

Glimpses of Animal Life from the Amoeba to the Insects.
By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of 'The Fairy Land of Science,' 'A Short History of Natural Science,' 'Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students.'

Extract from Preface.

"The main object is to acquaint young people with the structure and habits of the lower forms of life and to do this in a more systematic way than is usual in ordinary works on Natural History, and more deeply than in text-books on Zoology. For this reason I have adopted the title 'Life and Her Children,' to express the family bond uniting all living things. As we use the term 'Nature and Her Works,' to embrace all organic and inorganic phenomena, and I have been more careful to draw in bold outline the leading features of such studies than to dwell upon the minor differences by which it is separated into groups. I have made use of British examples in illustration wherever it was possible, and small specimens of most of the marine animals figured may be found upon our coast at low tide."

Eighth Thousand, crown 8vo. with 17 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.; or in calf, extra marbled edges, 11s.

THE FAIRYLAND OF SCIENCE.

By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of 'Life and Her Children,' &c.

"Her methods of presenting certain facts and phenomena difficult to group are most original and striking, and admirably calculated to enable the reader to realize the truth. As to the interest of her story we have tested it in a youthful subject, and she mentioned it in the same breath with 'Grimm's Fairy Tales.' We are sure any of the older children would welcome it as a Christmas present, but it deserves to take a permanent place in the literature of youth."—Times.

Post 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

BOTANY for CHILDREN.

An Illustrated Elementary Text-book for Junior Classes and Young Children. By the Rev. GEORGE HENBLOW,
M.A. F.L.S. F.R.G.S., Author of 'Floral Dissections.'

"Just such an elementary text-book of botany as might be put into practical use in schools without the slightest doubt that children would take to it."—Edinburgh Review.

Second Edition, crown 8vo. with 77 Illustrations, cloth, 7s. 6d.; or in calf extra, marbled edges, 11s.

A SHORT HISTORY of NATURAL SCIENCE,

And of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Day. For the Use of Schools and Young Persons. By ARABELLA BUCKLEY, Authoress of 'The Fairy Land of Science,' 'Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students,' &c.

"Guides to literature abound, guides to science similar in purpose and character to Miss Buckley's 'History' are unknown. The writer's plan, therefore, is original, and her execution of the plan is altogether admirable. She not only writes the descriptive, and the interest felt by the author is imparted to the reader. Diagrams and illustrations of the letter-press add to the value of the compendium."—Pall Mall Gazette.

ADAM AND EVE.

By Mrs. FARR, Author of 'Dorothy Fox.'

The TIMES.

"'Adam and Eve' has all the merits that have distinguished the author's former novels. The characters without exception are carefully conceived, and the leading ones dramatically thrown into the foreground. Mrs. Farr's more finished portraits abound in subtle but effective touches, nor is she by any means wanting in the quality of humour."

The ACADEMY.

"This charming writer has never excelled some of the graphic scenes to be found in 'Adam and Eve.' Mrs. Farr excels in truthful pictures of life."

LITERATURE

Ballads and other Poems. By Alfred Tennyson. (C. Kegan Paul & Co.)

The contents of this volume are various in value no less than in subject. We have always said that, despite superficial appearances to the contrary, Mr. Tennyson has more real variety of mood than any of his contemporaries, English or foreign; for to search heaven and earth, as the French poets do, to find new subjects and new problems, in order to scrutinise them and adjudicate upon them, always in one's own special temper and after one's own special fashion, is not to display variety of mood.

To say the truth, the poet is nowadays not quite so various as other people. The fine egotism of the poet, which impels him to express his emotions in song, naturally deafens his ears for the most part to those deeper harmonies, "musical as is Apollo's lute," to which the ears of the philosopher are attuned, and blinds his eyes to the wonderful drama—harlequinade and tragedy—in which the mere man of the world plays with such gusto his part. But then we used to set this right:—we used to starve our poets once and force them to hold horses at the theatre door. We coddle them now. The poet's intercourse with the world is through art and through books. His experience of men is second-hand. No man is so little able "to put himself in another's place." And this proves especially awkward for him when he comes to write dramas. Still, as has been said, Mr. Tennyson, for a nineteenth century poet, has remarkable variety of mood. It is astonishing that the man who wrote the 'Morte d'Arthur' and 'Ulysses' wrote also 'The Northern Farmer,' and that he wrote 'The Lotus Eaters,' and, again, such a lyric as 'Tears, Idle Tears.' Who could have believed before the publication of 'The Northern Farmer' that the poet of 'Locksley Hall,' as he once used to be called, was all the while one of the first humourists that England can boast of? For it must always be remembered that the humour of 'The Northern Farmer' is the deep humour of truthful representation, and not the humour of satire, or whim, or caricature, and that consequently it is, though so small in quantity, to be placed in the same class as the humour of Cervantes, Shakespeare, Sterne, and the creator of Sir Roger de Coverley. And the poems in Northern dialect published in this volume, though not equal to it, are worthy of the hand that produced it. 'The Northern Cobbler' and 'The Village Wife' are delicious reading. It is impossible to refrain from turning to them again and again. May the author live long to give us more of such work! Indeed, that this volume—full of power, beauty, and all kinds of poetical riches—should be the work of a poet in his seventy-second year would of itself be a subject for surprised comment at any other period. The author of 'The Earthly Paradise' has said some severe things about our age, on account chiefly of its steam engines, stuccoed houses, and Tottenham Court Road furniture. Undoubtedly our "day" is rather "empty," and the voice of Mr. Ruskin was needed in the land. Yet there is a homely proverb that declares the proof of the pudding to be in the eating; and in the matter of paradises, earthly or other, the main question, after all, is, How do the paradisaical fruits eat? how do the eaters flourish on their food? Certainly the honour of discovering the "Fountain of Youth" (which Mr. Morris must own was never really found by any mediæval explorer) may be claimed by the age that has produced Victor Hugo and Mr. Tennyson among poets, and Moltke among generals, to say nothing of the statesman, novelist, and epic poet in one to whom we are indebted for the most youthful novel of our time, 'Endymion.'

Time was when youth—as he and the late Lord Lytton went on declaring till a ripper experience taught them the superior beauty of middle age—was the only energy that could do the work of the world; and as to poetry, it has been the fashion among critics of Milton, down even to Mr. Mark Pattison, to disparage 'Samson Agonistes,' on the ground that its baldness of style arose from an exhaustion of what Shakespeare calls the poetic "gum." And as late as Byron and Shelley, poets at thirty were wont to speak of themselves as old men. Wordsworth, however, set the fashion of living long and produced poetry as long as he lived. The fashion was excellent, for publishers no less than for the public, and has been so successfully followed that at the age when Shelley and Byron would have considered themselves patriarchs, and long after the age when Shakespeare retired from dramatic business to Stratford, the poets of England, France, and America are either making a youthful beginning or branching out into new lines.

In one of the poems in this volume, Mr. Tennyson has, in our judgment, attained his highest reach as a poet dealing with the large issues of individual human life. It is called 'Rizpah,' and although the heroine is an English peasant of the last century whose son had been gibbeted, the motif is identical with that of the beautiful Bible story of her who, when her sons were hanged "in the hill before the Lord," "took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night." When we say that Mr. Tennyson in naming his poem after her who, as a pathetic figure, stands alone even among the sad sisters of Niobe, has not done a presumptuous thing, we are of course saying that he has produced a poem which has no equal in the tragic poetry of our time. It is impossible to read it without, as the poem goes on, being overwhelmed by a pity that is almost intolerable for the heroine of the poem. Having read it, it is impossible to recall it without a feeling of reverence for the great poet whose genius and deep heart called her into dramatic life.

RIZPAH, 17—

Wailing, wailing, the wind over land and sea—
And Willy's voice in the wind, "O mother, come out to me."
Why should he call me to-night, when he knows that I cannot go?
For the downs are as bright as day, and the full moon stares at the snow.
We should be seen, my dear; they would spy us out of the town.
The loud black nights for us, and the storm rushing over the down,
When I cannot see my own hand, but am led by the creak of the chain,
And grovel and grope for my son till I find myself drenched with the rain.
Anything fallen again? nay—what was there left to fall?
I have taken them home, I have number'd the bones, I have hidden them all.
What am I saying? and what are you? do you come as a spy?
Falls? what falls? who knows? As the tree falls so must it lie.
Who let her in? how long has she been? you—what have you heard them all?
Why did you sit so quiet? you never have spoken a word.
O—to pray with me—yes—a lady—none of their spies—
But the night has crept into my heart, and began to darken my eyes.
Ah—you, that have lived so soft, what should you know of the night,
The blast and the burning shame and the bitter frost and the fright?
I have done it, while you were asleep—you were only made for the day.
I have gather'd my baby together—and now you may go your way.
Nay—for it's kind of you, Madam, to sit by an old dying wife.
But say nothing hard of my boy, I have only an hour of life.
I kiss'd my boy in the prison, before he went out to die.
"They dared me to do it," he said, and he never has told me a lie.
I whipt him for robbing an orchard once when he was but a child—
"The farmer dared me to do it," he said; he was always so wild—
And idle—and couldn't be idle—my Willy—he never could rest.
The King should have made him a soldier, he would have been one of his best.
But he lived with a lot of wild mates, and they never would let him be good;
They swore that he dare not rob the mail, and he swore that he would,
And he took no life, but he took one purse, and when all was done
He flung it among his fellows—I'll none of it, said my son.
I came into court to the Judge and the lawyers. I told them my tale, God's own truth—but they kill'd him, they kill'd him for robbing the mail.
They hang'd him in chains for a show—we had always borne a good name—
To be hang'd for a thief—and then put away—isn't that enough shame?

Dust to dust—low down—let us hide! but they set him so high
That all the ships of the world could stare at him, passing by.
God 'ill pardon the hell-black raven and horrible fowls of the air,
But not the black heart of the lawyer who kill'd him and hang'd him there.
And the jailer forced me away. I had bid him my last goodbye;
They had fasten'd the door of his cell. "O mother!" I heard him cry.
I couldn't get back tho' I tried, he had something further to say,
And now I never shall know it. The jailer forced me away.
Then since I couldn't but hear that cry of my boy that was dead,
They seized me and shut me up: they fasten'd me down on my bed.
"Mother, O mother!"—he call'd in the dark to me year after year—
They beat me for that, they beat me—you know that I couldn't but hear;
And then at the last they found I had grown so stupid and still They let me abroad again—but the creatures had worked their will.
Flesh of my flesh was gone, but bone of my bone was left—
I stole them all from the lawyers—and you, will you call it a theft?—
My baby, the bones that had suck'd me, the bones that had laughed and had cried Theirs? O no! they are mine—not theirs—they had moved in my side.
Do you think I was scared by the bones? I kiss'd 'em, I buried 'em all—
I can't dig deep, I am old—in the night by the churchyard wall.
My Willy 'ill rise up whole when the trumpet of judgment 'ill sound,
But I charge you never to say that I laid him in holy ground.
They would scratch him up—they would hang him again on the cursed tree.
Sin? O yes—we are sinners, I know—let all that be,
And read me a Bible verse of the Lord's good will toward men—
"Full of compassion and mercy, the Lord"—let me hear it again;
"Full of compassion and mercy—long-suffering." Yes, O yes!
For the lawyer is born but to murder—the Saviour lives but to bless.
He'll never put on the black cap except for the worst of the worst,
And the first may be last—I have heard it in church—and the last may be first.
Suffering—O long-suffering—yes, as the Lord must know,
Year after year in the mist and the wind and the shower and the snow.
Heard, have you? what? they have told you he never repented his sin.
How do they know it? are they his mother? are you of his kin?
Heard? have you ever heard, when the storm on the downs began,
The wind that 'ill wail like a child and the sea that 'ill moan like a man?

And here it may be worth while to discuss a question which is, we think, important at this time, when foreign influences are doing our literature no good; and, moreover, it is to be feared that we shall have after this poem a run upon gibbets. How is it that so few poets could, even granting them the genius, produce work to affect the reader as this does? The answer is that it is because a story in which is contained such a vast amount of pity and terror cannot be treated in any way that is tolerable at all save by a poet who is entirely superior to the infirmity common to most poets—pride of poetic power.

It is one out of many proofs of the empirical nature of criticism that pride of power has never yet been treated as an important agent of poetical production. It may be said, no doubt, that after vanity, which is first, pride is the great motor of human action. Just as a man with an exceptional power of wind and limb takes pride in risking his neck on Mont Blanc, and just as a rich citizen takes pride in displaying the length and strength of his purse, so the poet, the moment he is hailed as the possessor of poetical power, feels impelled at once to pose as a poetical athlete. He knows well enough, of course, that his duty as an artist is to use pity and terror merely so as to produce an effect which is at bottom pleasurable. But he cares nothing at all about giving his readers pleasure. He wants to display his power. He must give us pictures of the "Furies" so terrible that he narrowly escapes being torn to pieces by the real furies he has awakened in the breasts of his audience. He must give us pictures of hell that make Christianity itself seem wicked. He must harrow us. He must, in short, show in the style of 'Titus Andronicus,' 'The Duchess of Malfi,' 'Manfred,' 'The Cenci,' 'Le Roi s'Amuse,' how strong he is at the expense of all the holiest sanctions of art, till mankind becomes sickened at the display, and is inclined to beg the poets to return to their golden clime, and not turn our clime into a pandemonium of unholy passions or into shambles of blood and bones. Now, from this kind of pride Mr. Tennyson has always been free—so free that it has not unfrequently been questioned whether he had the power to be proud of. From the first his power has been, with a very few exceptions, as far above what his subjects demanded as the reverse has been the case with some of his contemporaries in England and France. And the result of this training is that, terrible and harrowing as is the subject of 'Rizpah,' there is not a single outrage of our sensibilities—not a single false note.

It must be said, however, for English poets, that the difference between English artistic instincts and French is never more strikingly exhibited than in the treatment for artistic purposes of the maternal instinct. There is no people in the world among whom the relations between mother and child are so deep, true, and poetic as among the French; it is by far the most beautiful thing in French society; but compare the treatment of the subject of maternal love as a passion at bay, in this poem, and again in such stories as Scott's 'Highland Widow,' with its handling by so great a writer as Victor Hugo in the death of La Esmeralda, in the tooth-drawing of Fantine, and above all in the great scene in 'Quatre-vingt-treize.' Victor Hugo is the most splendid genius of the three, and has as deep and tender a heart as any in the world, but how ineffective is all his elaborate machinery of pathos when set against the simplicity of Scott and Mr. Tennyson! Pride of power has ruined M. Hugo's finest work, as it has ruined so much good work in France.

The historical ballads printed in this volume (of which there are two), are successes, no doubt, and yet not brilliant successes. In the historical ballad the first requisite is "business." Whatever in the smallest degree interferes with this, whether it is the importation of unbusinesslike matter or the use of unbusinesslike metre, is injurious. Unexpected metrical effects—fundamental irregularities of pause and stanzaic arrangement—are dangerous. If, for instance, we are waiting for the expected striking down of the hero, we demand that the rhymes and their arrangement shall be aids in our rush towards the catastrophe; and if we are suddenly brought to a halt by finding no answering rhyme where we expected one, and have to ask ourselves when this expected rhyme is to come, our imaginative pleasure is baffled and thwarted to a certain extent. The otherwise fine ballad, 'The Revenge,' is very seriously injured by forgetfulness of this most obvious law. Long lines and short lines, long stanzas and short stanzas, are mixed up without the slightest principle at moments when the reader's imagination has no time to wait; and, moreover, some of the lines are so harsh as to be with difficulty scanned. It is a pity, for the ballad has every requisite but this one. Yet it is doubtful whether Mr. Tennyson's genius—energetic always, but never brisk—is suited to the historical ballad. There are symptoms of a spurring of Pegasus in the lines of 'The Defence of Lucknow'—a rather exclamatory style, which an ungallant criticism would call feminine, and which makes us think that, varied as are his gifts, this kind of work is hardly in harmony with them.

Nor can we think any of the blank-verse poems particularly successful. The monologue of 'Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham,' is the best of them, but even here we get that stiff, inflexible kind of verse which seems to have grown upon Mr. Tennyson since the latest of the 'Idylls of the King'—a stiffness which arises, it would seem, from an attempt to artificially hold up his sentences by forcing into them parenthetical matter, and so producing an artificial cadence, instead of suffering no sentence to be elevated save by the only natural means of elevation—that of the thought or emotion which gives the sentence birth. We wish that our poets could see that no subject is fit for treatment in blank verse unless it can call from the writer sufficient glow of emotion to raise it to, and sustain it at, the elevation required for cadence without any resort to artifices such as that of parenthetical interpolation or antithetical balancing.

Our great fear is, however, that Mr. Tennyson has got so thoroughly into the custom of writing thus that, even where the subject is such as to call up the requisite emotive glow, he relies, unconsciously and unnecessarily, upon the artifice which has become a habit. There can be no doubt that when Mr. Tennyson wrote his dedicatory poem to Princess Alice, he felt most deeply the pathos of the subject. Yet what can possibly seem more cold and artificial than these carefully balanced antithetical lines?—

Dead Princess, living Power, if that, which lived
True life, live on—and if the fatal time,
Born of true life and love, divorce thee not
From earthly love and life—if what we call
The spirit flash not all at once from out
This shadow into Substance—then perhaps
The mellow'd murmur of the people's praise
From thine own State, and all our breadth of realm,
Where Love and Longing dress thy deeds in light,
Ascends to thee.

There seems to be a fatality about the writing of English blank verse. The fundamental difference between rhymed verse and blank verse is that while rhymed verse has for support harmony, melody, rhyme, colour, and what not, and can, in the level and working passages of a poem, dispense with mere distinction or style, blank verse, though it has all these save rhyme, cannot without distinction or style exist at all; and if the mere working portions of a poem are too level in matter to call up the glow requisite to give this distinction, an artificial distinction has to be manufactured for blank verse to distinguish it from prose. Moreover, as in other matters of distinction or individual accent, the poet's style is sure to reach its culmination, and then it is liable to at once degenerate into mere manner—to afterwards sink further still into mannerism. The poet begins by modelling his style upon that of previous writers or a previous writer—strikes out at last a style of his own, works in it, elaborates it, brings it to perfection, and then overdoes it. Shakspeare is an illustrious example of this. He began by imitating Marlowe, but finding (what most likely Marlowe would have found had he lived) that the "mighty line" is quite unfitted to render the varied and fluctuant life of drama (being really an epic movement), he invented a style of his own. The miracle of this style is that the pleasure we get from it is a something between the pleasure afforded by perfect prose rhythm and the pleasure afforded by poetic rhythm. And when we consider that the pleasure afforded by poetic rhythm is that of expecting the fulfilment of a recognized law of cadence, while the pleasure afforded by prose rhythm is that its cadences shall come upon us by surprise, it is no wonder if Shakspeare is the only poet who can catch and secure both these kinds of pleasure and alternate them. But even Shakspeare was human: the older he got and the more he drank the delight of faithfully rendering Nature, the more he felt inclined to make the expected cadence (the cadence of art) yield to the unexpected cadence (that of nature); and in some of his latest plays there are often between the great passages tracts of matter which, so far as any metrical music goes, might as well have been written in prose. And in the same way Milton, beginning also with Marlowe's movement, carrying it to its highest possible point in the early books of 'Paradise Lost,' could hardly finish the poem without being overmastered by the style natural to his own didactic instincts, which in 'Paradise Regained' flattened the lines and produced his mannerism.

In the 'Morte d'Arthur' Mr. Tennyson had reached a style exceedingly noble of its kind; it seemed to combine the excellences of Wordsworth and of Milton. And the blank verse of 'Guinevere' was also very fine, though there were unpleasant affectations—such obvious tricks, for instance, as that of seeking perpetually to get emphasis by throwing a long pause after the first foot of the line, a device which Milton had already made so stale that it is surprising any successor dared to venture upon it. But from the publication of 'Guinevere' Mr. Tennyson's style stiffened with every poem, became more mannered and more cold, and it almost seems from the blank-verse pieces in this volume as if it will not revive. It is, however, rash to prophesy anything of a poet who has shown such amazing power of rejuvenescence as Mr. Tennyson has displayed in some of these poems.

South America. By Antonio Gallenga. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS account of a tour through a considerable part of South America originally appeared in a series of letters to the Times newspaper. The fact is not mentioned by Mr. Gallenga, but the work is dedicated "to John Walter, Esq., M.P., by whose desire" the tour "was undertaken and accomplished." When read in the columns in which they first appeared the letters compared favourably with the leading article that invariably kept them company, and which was but the faint echo of the stronger voice. Now that they are presented to the reader in a collected form, he looks at them in a different light, and the interest they excited on their first reading gives place to critical examination. Errors there are, but not important; they do not in the least affect the story which Mr. Gallenga has to tell—the story, namely, of what he saw with his own eyes as he journeyed at full speed from Panama to Callao and Lima, staying a fortnight in the latter place before making an excursion to the mountains of Peru, and then steaming south to Valparaiso, the land of Valdivia, the Straits of Magellan, the cities of the Plate, and the empire of Brazil.

While reading Mr. Gallenga's eloquent descriptions of lake and mountain scenery, and enjoying his cultivated satire, the reader will be reminded again and again of the Pizarros and the Almagros of times gone by; of that arrogant firebrand the monk Valverde, who was the real murderer of Atahualpa; of the restless, ambitious Alvarado, and those roistering dare-devils the Carvajals; for as we travel with our special correspondent, he, though unwittingly, recalls to our recollection "the deeds of violence, the avarice, ambition, bigotry, cruelty, and jealousy which marked and marred" those times, together with "the utter disregard of all faith, honour, and conscience in whatever there was most admirable and most execrable in the old Spanish character,"—all is still there in its full, unmitigated ugliness, except, indeed, that element of heroic courage which sufficed to raise the adventurers of the past above the level of the present cutthroats. If any reader desires to see a proof of this he should read the letter of Mr. Gallenga on Paraguay, which contains a picture of "Lopez II., a monster cast in the mould of the most loathsome tyrants of the ancient Greek and mediæval Italian republics."

Mr. Gallenga risked his neck on the "Grand Central Trans-Andean Line," commonly known as the Lima and Oroya Railway. "The gallant little special engine" which carried him went

"rattling up at full speed against a mass of huge rocks where you absolutely see no issue, when she suddenly backs, and threads her way on a higher zig-zag path on the right, then on another still higher zig-zag path on the left, and so on for four or five zig-zags and as many tunnels, one above the other on the same mountain-side."

till he reached the height of 16,000 feet above the level of the sea; and all that our special correspondent gained for his pains seems to be the momentous belief

"that there is actually nothing that skill may not achieve, and that could any Titan pile Pelion upon Ossa, and both on Olympus, nothing could prevent the locomotive from reaching the steps of Jupiter's throne."

It was not necessary to go to Peru to come to that conclusion, but we quote Mr. Gallenga's words in order to show with what fondness a special correspondent is apt to report upon what is nothing else than a stupendous folly, and what little regard he pays to the useful if its proportions are too lowly to figure in a newspaper letter. For example, the railway across the Isthmus of Panama is "altogether a North American contrivance," "commonplace, anything but comfortable, and 'tantsoit peu blackguardy,' as a young Danish fellow traveller observed"; "the ticket costs 5*l.* sterling, the distance is forty-seven miles, and the time taken in crossing from end to end is four hours." But when once the train penetrates the "umbrageous multitude of leaves" which hang above it, pierced by columns of twenty-one different palms, standing in thousands, whose fronds are mingled with those of the banana, the mangrove, the cacao, the sugar-cane, fruit trees of every kind, bread trees, cotton trees, and the mighty cedar, whose crests assume every Protean shape, &c., Mr. Gallenga is in his element, and a whole column is forthwith added to the Times. This is one of the complaints to be made of Mr. Gallenga's letters—he tells chiefly of the marvels which catch his eye as he is whirled past them at full speed, but takes little trouble to inform his readers of what they fail would know. This "commonplace" railway, as he calls it, is worth twenty such railways as the magnificent "Grand Central Trans-Andean Line." The Panama Railway connects the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans; the Grand Central Trans-Andean connects Lima with some bright and glistening snow 16,000 feet above the sea level. The former, though it cost much to construct, has saved a hundred times more lives than it slew, though it slew thousands of labourers; the construction of the latter has done nothing but help to land a whole people in hopeless, irretrievable bankruptcy, vanity, and self-conceit. A quarter of a century ago, if it had been Mr. Gallenga's lot to cross the Isthmus of Panama, he would have been only too glad to pay, not 5*l.* for a seat among "barefooted negroes" in the present crowded cars, but ten times that amount.

Mr. Gallenga discusses at some length and with much calmness the plans of the canal which M. Lesseps proposes to cut across the Isthmus of Panama, "the benefits of which," he says, "would exceed all human calculations, and even surpass those conferred on mankind by the Suez Canal." If, after reading Mr. Gallenga's volume, any sane person puts his money into that great scheme, or, indeed, any other scheme of lesser or greater magnitude in South America, let him not apply to the British Government for help to recover him of his losses: he will simply deserve to lose every penny.

The interest which Mr. Gallenga's volume deserves to excite among the reading public is increased by the struggle still raging between Chili and Peru, the issue of which is not doubtful, and never has been, to those well acquainted with both countries. Into the origin or merits of this war it is not our purpose to enter, except so far as to say that, simple as the question is, Mr. Gallenga has hardly grappled with it as he might have done, and as will be expected of him by those who consult his pages; while not a little disappointment will fall upon those readers who look for accurate information on what is described as the wealth of Peru. Sugar, nitrate, guano, silver, gold, and copper mines, to say nothing of healing balsams, quinine, and very precious wools, are the main sources of the wealth of Peru, but of these Mr. Gallenga tells nothing. When travelling on the "Grand Central Trans-Andean Line" he glanced at a sugar estate on his way to the summit, but that is all. "The vicuñas, huanaos, and alpacas," he says, "roam the hills untamed, but are hunted and killed for their skins, their furs fetching high prices." Surely a man so well informed as Mr. Gallenga must know that the alpaca has been a domesticated animal in Peru from time immemorial, and that if the Peruvians, instead of figuring before the world as statesmen, generals, and Freemasons, had attended to the cultivation of the alpaca, they might now be in the enjoyment of a steady nett income of more than twenty million pounds sterling a year, even had they left every other branch of native industry untouched. Further, we should be glad to learn on what authority the statement is based that the guano at Huanillo, Point Lobos, Pabellon de Pica, and Chipana Bay "was, two years ago, reckoned at about 1,800,000 tons"; and that it "is inferior in quality, mixed up with sand and stone, and deficient in ammonia." If Mr. Gallenga could have given information about these things founded on personal knowledge it would have been of much value. Guano being the one thing which forms the foundation of all Peruvian greatness, including the "Grand Central Trans-Andean Railway," he might have taken a little pains to tell his readers at least how it looks out there, and what, at a rough guess, might be the amount of this precious commodity, say, for instance, at the Pabellon de Pica. It is a more serious matter than Mr. Gallenga supposes; for if it should turn out, after a calm examination into facts, that the, say, in round numbers, 2,000,000 tons of Mr. Gallenga's guano amount to more than 10,000,000 tons, then the issue of the conflict at present raging on the west coast of South America may be more important than he imagines. We do not enter into these things, but that a special correspondent, sent out to Peru at a critical period in her history to report to a great commercial journal on her civilization and way of life, should tell nothing about guano except what he repeats on hearsay, must prove a sore disappointment to many.

Mr. Gallenga writes in better spirits when he gets far south of Peru, and finds himself under a canopy of foliage, "hour after hour, and day after day," going "through the midst of tall straight timber [sic] shooting up to the sky in glorious clusters, opening into vistas, solemn as the aisles of some grand Gothic minster," round the bays of Lake Llanquihue. Chapters x. and xi. will be read with unwonted attention, for they unconsciously associate themselves with what is too painfully pressed upon our attention in the London daily papers at the present moment. Mr. Gallenga observes:—

"Much of the improvident method of agriculture in the 'Vale of Chili' is ascribed to the fact that the land, originally taken from the indigenous races by right of conquest, was allotted to a few great proprietors, whose descendants have held and still hold enormous estates, passing from generation to generation, from father to son, and that these, being assured of permanent affluence, were satisfied with such revenue as might be got from the land with the least possible trouble or expense. The class of these wealthy Acendados, or landowners, have been looked upon as the bane of Chili, as fatal to this country as the Borghese, the Chigi, the Barberini, and other princes are, or were, to the untitled Roman Campagna; like these perpetuating the evil by those laws of primogeniture which tended to concentrate all property, as well as the government of the country, into the interested hands of a few privileged families."

Here, too, we are again brought face to face with the far-off romantic past; and those who know that noble poem of Ercilla, 'La Araucana,' will return to it after reading Mr. Gallenga's pages with redoubled interest and admiration.

We have no wish to part company with a companion so agreeable as Mr. Gallenga. We should be glad, did space permit, to go with him to the "Magellanic State," the "Plate Republics," and to Brazil, with its twenty provinces, its coffee, sugar, cotton, tobacco, maize, maté, india-rubber, hides of beasts; "the tercentenary of Camoens"; the tramways of Rio, which carry "40,000,000 passengers a year"; "the Amazon and its tributaries, navigable for 24,500 miles"; and the "able-bodied negro, who fetches from 200*l.* to 300*l.* at a public auction." But there is no space for all these things; the reader will have pleasure in reading them for himself; and he may rest assured that if the book contains much that was already well known, yet the writer discourses in so excellent a way that he will not fail to commend to a fresh consideration many things with which the instructed reader was previously well acquainted. Perhaps Mr. Gallenga's work will produce its greatest effect on that generation of men who just now are called upon to study great national events; for here they can see as in a glass, not darkly, the result of three hundred years of misrule on the part of politicians and of the false teaching of immoral priests, the destruction that is in store for all who work unrighteousness, and the disgrace and infamy that are contained in all false dealing, and which must, sooner or later, fall upon the transgressors, be they black or white, learned or simple.

Horace's Odes: Englished and Imitated by Various Hands. Selected and Arranged by Charles W. F. Cooper. (Bell & Sons.)

MR. COOPER has chosen an interesting subject, and has produced a suggestive little book. He certainly, however, does not exhaust the materials which lie ready at hand, and we can well imagine a volume of translations of Horace at once more useful and more attractive.

What Mr. Cooper has given is a series of selected translations of the odes, "limited to [Mr. Cooper means extending no further than] the writers of the earlier part of the present century, the latest in point of date (with the exception of an ode by Barry Cornwall) being those of Leigh Hunt and the Rev. John Mitford." A second part contains a number of imitations and parodies, and these are often exceedingly amusing. Now, by limiting himself to the older translators, Mr. Cooper has deprived his readers of some of the best and most vigorous translations. To name no others, we have here no specimen of Lord Lytton, Lord Ravensworth, Prof. Newman, Sir Theodore Martin, Whyte Melville, or Prof. Conington. Then there have been capital translations of single odes by the late Lord Derby, Lord Denman, and Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Calverley, moreover, has written brilliant renderings of some fifteen of the best-known odes. All these and many more have been omitted.

Nor is the list complete of the older translators. Walsh and Otway and others translated single odes, and we have here no example of them, nor of Green or Coxwell, who translated the whole. Coxwell's translations are particularly amusing. He addresses Mæcenas:—

Great Sir, that didst from Royal Race descend,
My safeguard, dear and honoured friend;
and his "Pernicos odi" begins:—

When I, my boy, beneath the shade
T' enjoy my friend sit down,
Let not thy wretch be shining made
Like Ariadne's crown.

Indeed, all throughout, he takes liberties with his author of the most surprising kind. And there are still two other points where Mr. Cooper has made an error of judgment. He has not given an entire translation, and he has often failed to give the best translation of a particular ode. Why does he supply no translation of Ode i. 24, that beautiful ode to Virgil, or i. 28, on Archytas, or i. 37, "Nunc est bibendum"? and the omissions in the other books are at least equally flagrant. That Mr. Cooper has been right in giving more than one version of an ode in several cases is undeniable, but no ode should have been left out in the cold entirely. Nor is it possible to believe that he has always selected the happiest rendering of an ode. To take the very first, was Broomes's diffuse

Mæcenas, whose high lineage springs
From a long race of ancient kings, really the best procurable version of Mæcenas, atavis editis regibus!

Accepting, then, this book as a mere pledge and promise of something better to come, we would recommend a competent scholar to arrange a complete translation of Horace, supplying the best versions of every ode, and illustrating them with engravings from the most appropriate gems. Such a book would be in every sense a treasury of poetry and art, and would popularize Horace as he has never yet been made popular.

Those translations from the older poets which Mr. Cooper has printed—we are not speaking now of the imitations—are seldom particularly happy. They are often quaint, and sometimes fairly accurate; but they are more often laboured, and show singularly little poetic fire. Then the metres seem almost always matter of complete indifference, and instead of choosing the best English equivalents for the Latin versification, the translators for the most part seem to take the first thing that comes to hand, and utterly fail in giving any impression of the original poem.

There are, it need hardly be said, two theories as to the best way in which to translate Horace, or, indeed, any ancient poet. In the one case the effort is to translate as closely as possible, and to reproduce the curiosa felicitas of each expression. In the other the aim is rather to sacrifice exactness of expression to fidelity of impression, and to produce a version which, if less satisfactory to the scholar, shall more clearly show the unscholarly in what the charm of the poem consisted when men first heard it.

The two most popular translators of our own day have been Sir Theodore Martin and Prof. Conington, and they represent very fairly the advantages and disadvantages of these two theories of translation. Nothing can be better than many of Prof. Conington's separate renderings, and nothing less graceful than the general effect too often is. In Sir Theodore Martin we have versé and swing enough, but the tone is sometimes quite too modern, and the translation is occasionally loose and inadequate. We may venture to quote a few lines from a private letter of Prof. Conington's when sending a copy of his 'Horace' to a friend, as it expresses very generously his estimate of his own deficiencies. He says his 'Horace'

"is intended to remind people of the original, not to produce the effect of the original on those who don't know Latin; that is, it seems to me, the work of an original poet, and is certainly beyond me. If you know Theodore Martin's translation, which is, perhaps, the only one that has had much success, you will see what I mean by contrast. He will remind you of Moore and other English poets. I shall, I fear, remind you of nothing.

Then, supposing it possible to combine the best parts of each scheme of translation, there are further difficulties ahead. What metres will properly represent sapphic or alcaic or scæpiad? We may at once set aside the idea of writing English sapphics or alcaics. 'The Needy Knife-Grinder' is all very well in its way, but these Latin metres give little or no pleasure to an ordinary Englishman, and even the English hexameter remains (what some one once called the potato) "a precarious exotic." Then come the unrhymed metres, of which Milton's 'Pyrrha' is the best-known example, and which Lord Lytton used exclusively in his translation. We know all that can be said in their favour, but the fact remains that they will only be agreeable to a very cultivated ear. Prof. Conington, like most translators, falls back on rhymes, but he gives far too great prominence to iambic over the lighter and gayer trochaic measures. Sir Theodore Martin employs all sorts of metres, some of them effective enough, but many which do not in the least represent the original. What can be less like a sapphic stanza than

Persia's pomp, my boy, I hate,
No coronals of flowers rare
For me on bark of linden plait,
Nor seek thou to discover where
The lush rose lingers late?

Perhaps the nearest approach we can get to an English metre representing the sapphic would be such a trochaic measure as:—

Boy, I hate these Persian deckings,
Me the linden chaplets fret:
Seek no more if rose late blowing Linger yet.

For the alcaic we know nothing better than the metre of Coleridge's 'Christabel,' and the first scæpiad might fairly be turned into such rhyming trochaics as Keats's 'Robin Hood.' But, again, when the matter of metre has been disposed of, there is the collocation of the words in Horace, which means so much, and is so difficult to maintain in any translation. How much depends, in the first two lines of the first ode, on the antithetical endings of "regibus" and "meum"! Mæcenæ's ancestors were kings, but nevertheless he is "præsidium et dulce decus" to the humble poet. It is the same in countless instances, but few translators even attempt to preserve these finer shades of poetic diction. Lastly, there are in Horace expressions full of meaning to a Roman, but which, if literally translated, either give no idea at all, or at most an idea that is inadequate and often even unpleasant. Let us take, for instance, an expression in the Ode to Neobule. This young lady is in love with a certain young athlete of the name of Hebrus, and Horace recounts all his perfections. It is delightful to see him swimming, as he plunges his "unctis humeros" in the river. How is this to be translated? Creech, in Mr. Cooper's volume, speaks of "his oyl'd arms"; Lord Lytton has "anointed with oil," Sir Theodore Martin prefers "balm-dropping shoulders," and Prof. Conington has:—

O, to see him when anointed he is plunging in the flood!

Perhaps the only way of getting rid of difficulty and absurdity together is to translate by some such word as "shining" or "glossy"; but this instance only illustrates one of the perils which beset the translator of Horace.

But we must now turn to the second part of this volume, the imitations and parodies. The first imitation which Mr. Cooper gives is Marvell's fine Horatian Ode to Cromwell, but, magnificent as it is, it is rather after the style of Horace than an imitation of any one ode; there is, however, though Mr. Cooper does not mention it, probably a reminiscence of the passage in Ode i. 37, on Cleopatra's death, in Marvell's memorable lines on Charles I.'s execution. The most amusing parodies in this collection are from 'Horace in London,' by the two Smiths, and there are bits hardly inferior to the best in the 'Rejected Addresses.'

Mr. Cooper has omitted one capital parody on the "Lydia, dic, per omnes"; it was by Lord Holland (Charles James Fox's father), and was addressed to Lady Sarah Bunbury, once the Lady Sarah Lennox of George III.'s youthful admiration, and afterwards the mother of all the Napiers:—

Sally, Sally, don't deny,
But, for God's sake, tell me why
You have flirted so, to spoil
That once lively youth, Carlisle!
He used to mount while it was dark,
Now he lies in bed till noon;
And you not meeting in the park,
Thinks that he got up too soon.

Manly exercise and sport,
Hunting and the tennis-court,
And riding school no more divert:
Newmarket does, for there you flirt!
But why does he no longer dream
Of yellow Tiber and its shore;
Of his friend Charles's favourite scheme
On waking think no more?
Why does he dislike an inn?
Hate postchaises, and begin
To think 'twill be enough to know
His way from Almack's to Sobo?
Achilles thus kept out of fight
For a long time; but this dear boy
(If, Sally, you and I guess right)
Will never get to Troy.

We must find room for one other parody, which is particularly neat in its execution and has not been published. It is on the "Persicos odi," from which we have already quoted:—

Jane, I hate æsthetic carpets,
High Art curtains make me swear,
Pray cease hunting for the latest Queen Anne chair.
I care nothing for improvements
On the simple style of Snell,
Which will suit both you and me extremely well.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- The Rebel of the Family.* By E. Lynn Linton. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)
A Sailor's Sweetheart. By W. Clark Russell. 3 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)
The Mystery in Palace Gardens. By Mrs. J. H. Riddell. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)
The Glen of Silver Birches. By E. Owens Blackburne. 2 vols. (Remington & Co.)
A Day of Fate. By the Rev. E. P. Roe. 2 vols. (Ward, Lock & Co.)
Hilary's Love Story. By Georgiana M. Craik. "Blue Bell Series." (Marcus Ward & Co.)

In 'The Rebel of the Family' Mrs. Lynn Linton appears to much greater advantage than in that tract in three volumes which she styled 'Under which Lord?' The public are now pretty well acquainted with the author's merits and defects. Her novels are exceedingly well written, the dialogue is full—perhaps too full—of point, the descriptions are carefully worked up, and every effort is made to develop an interesting plot. On the other hand, she possesses little of the novelist's most precious gift—the power of creating characters. Most of her dramatic persons are carefully constructed lay figures, who speak and act consistently, but fail to impress the reader with a sense of their reality. In this respect, however, 'The Rebel of the Family' is more successful than most of Mrs. Linton's books. Perdite, the heroine, is really a charming character, and her worldly mother is excellently drawn. On the other hand, Leslie Crawford is dreadfully wooden; and a most conventional French viscount, who has figured in scores of English novels, mars a work that might otherwise be pronounced a brilliant success. As it is, 'The Rebel of the Family' cannot rank above the second class of novels, but among them it merits a high place. So good, however, is it that Mrs. Linton would do well to eliminate her villain and recast the work, confining it to two volumes.

The title 'A Sailor's Sweetheart' will hardly lead people to expect the sort of book that Mr. Clark Russell has written. A second title explains that the story is that of the wreck of the ship Waldershare, told by the second mate. The book is very much after the model of Mr. Clark Russell's first book, 'The Wreck of the Grosvenor,' which was favourably noticed in these columns at the time of its appearance. 'A Sailor's Sweetheart' deserves no less praise. Without reading the earlier work over again it is not easy to say positively that the style of the later one is more vivid, more vigorous, or more direct, but in the way of straightforward narrative and description of ships, sea, and seafaring people, nothing can be better than Mr. Clark Russell's writing. The tale of the wreck of the Grosvenor was a little disfigured by the horror of some of the incidents and the excessive minuteness with which certain revolting scenes were depicted. 'A Sailor's Sweetheart' has very little of this defect. The description of the finding of the captain's body hanging from a beam in his cabin is perhaps unnecessarily horrible. Although it is hard to say that the writer is not justified in his details by the power with which he has drawn his picture, still this excessive realism has its repulsive side, and it would have been better if Mr. Clark Russell had contented himself with a less painful exactness. At the same time no word should be said which should leave the impression that the writer has not produced a book which is strikingly original. He should have the credit, which he fully deserves, of having found a new way of treating the nautical novel. It is almost to be regretted that Mr. Clark Russell should have written the preface to 'A Sailor's Sweetheart.' Annoyed by some criticism of his nautical details in 'The Wreck of the Grosvenor,' he sets himself to vindicate his fidelity to facts and nature, which it might have been supposed was obvious on the face of his work. The defence, which consists mainly of a quotation from an American paper, in which a general corroboration of his story is given, does very little to strengthen his position. It is to be hoped that Mr. Clark Russell will feel himself strong enough to disregard any detracting criticism of his new book. This, at all events, is quite certain—no reader will be bored by it. One cannot read the story fast enough; and even when most anxious to skip in order to find out what is to happen, one feels obliged to read straight on, even in spite of the technical details, which are necessarily more or less unintelligible to a landsman. And yet the book cannot be called a novel in the ordinary sense of the term. It is not a story with a plot turning upon love. There is no plot in it, and the love tale has no intricacies, but goes right on, and only helps to increase the interest of the adventures and to ornament the book by its good taste and simple feeling. In one place the author has made a slip:—

"I set my back against the mast, and levelled the glass at the sea that was over the jibboom of the brig, and very carefully swept the horizon away on the left-hand side until I had observed every inch of it as far as the point lying directly over the stern, and then crossed to the other side of the yard, and beginning again with the glass, I had worked as far as three points on the port bow," &c.

The words "left-hand side" and "port bow" in this passage cannot stand together; it appears from the subsequent description that "left-hand side" must be wrong. It may also be noticed that the author speaks of eight feet of water in the hold of the brig, which had been made water-tight, though some time before the water had been reduced to five feet. It is to be regretted that Mr. Clark Russell should have once written "lay" for lie, for his writing is, as a rule, singularly correct as well as forcible.

The astute servant of the equally astute Miss Bankes was right in adopting "the mystery in Palace Gardens" as the best phrase for popular use in reference to the events related in Mrs. Riddell's novel, and for skilful application as a lever for extorting money. Like most modern "mysteries," at least of those known to the newspaper press under that name, a vulgar sin is at the bottom of the secret. But though Sir John Moffat is commonplace in his guilt, there being nothing but the woman's beauty to palliate adultery with the wife of a friend, the author has done her best as an artist with the theme of his repentance; and the relations between Rachel, his wife's child but not his own, and her supposed father are touching, and as true to nature as anything can be in a story based upon so improbable a plot. For Lady Moffat one can feel nothing but repulsion; she is too absolutely unrelieved by any touch of human feeling to be natural. The old farmer and his daughter, in whose nest such a strange cuckoo is found, are much more lifelike, and their conflicting emotions of bewilderment, indignation, and regret when Mira's character displays itself are well exhibited. The author shows some of that power of pressing the moods of external nature into the service of her characters which is a trait of most good novelists, and Rachel in her little room overlooking the yews in Kensington Gardens on a wild March evening is a figure to remember. Altogether, in spite of the unpromising subject, the interest of the story is considerable, and increases as the reader proceeds.

At the present time, when half the English public are aroused to sympathy with Irish distress, and the other half thrilled with indignation at Irish crime, so well told a story as that of Miss Blackburne has a special claim to attention. In her desire to point the contrast between English want of tact and Irish susceptibility, between Saxon literalness and Celtic imagination, the author has certainly in Stevens, the police officer, drawn a very unreal figure. It was not necessary for her purpose to describe the Englishman as truculent and underbred, or to lead us to infer that it is an English habit to go about giving ladies and gentlemen the lie direct, or to regale them in their own houses with threats and insolence. The story would have had a finer point had this stage villain, who is as unreal as Mrs. Linton's Frenchman, been omitted from the cast, and the really masterly comparison between Thurgood, the well-intentioned Manchester landlord, and his wild neighbours in Donegal been left to stand alone. An honest man is Thurgood, just, if a trifle exacting, and animated by a genuine desire to improve the condition of those who dislike nothing more than any encroachment on the indolent old ways. But what chance has such a one against the antagonism of the fine old lady who keeps up the traditions of her fathers by supporting with alms and shelter all those who, for whatever reason, are in a position to require them; against the fierce verses of Randal MacSorley, whose lucubrations in the Nationalist paper are read aloud to the peasants round the fire, and inspire them with all the passions for which history, supplemented by invention, can find a theme? What chance has a plain man against the scheming of Counsellor Lynch or the spiritual leverage of Father Fennewy, or a generous man against the tearful indignation which fills the eyes of sweet Nuala O'Donnell? So his sheep are worried in the fold, he is shot in his own ball-room when striving to conciliate his neighbours, and brave Duncan Cameron, the steward, for no fault of his own, lies slain by night upon the hill. How the bold peasantry regard the last misfortune may be gathered from the cry, when they stone his widow as she tries to protect their neighbour, the Counsellor's man: "She's the wife of the Scotch steward—bad luck to him!—that helped to get Master Randal MacSorley into jail! Boys, boys, why d'ye spare her?" Pitiful as is the story, there is no exaggeration in its sensational features. It is written with the sympathy of a native for the peasants' point of view; it does justice to the kindly and humorous side of the national character; as we have seen, it makes more than full allowance for the overbearing aspect of the stranger in the land; yet we rise from its perusal more than ever despondent of the reconciliation of such hopeless contradictions.

'A Day of Fate' is the autobiography, or part of the autobiography, of a gentleman who describes himself as a night-editor; and perhaps he might have been nearer the mark if he had printed on his title-page "The Adventures of a Night-editor in Quest of his Fate." From beginning to end he is talking about his destiny, which he seems to have run after and angled for as though it were certainly to be had for the trouble of fishing. He finds it in a Quaker's family, though not in the pretty Quakers whom he first tries to identify with it. Mr. Roe's story is, of course, set in a background of American life and character, which he paints graphically enough, making his reader thoroughly familiar with the people he introduces him to. The quiet current of existence amongst Farmer Yocomb's family and acquaintance—relieved, indeed, by one fairly sensational incident—is of the homely kind that has been made familiar to us in former volumes from the same author, and from more than one or two of his countrymen. Its interest depends very much upon the spirit with which we throw ourselves into the stream; and there is no doubt that if a reader begins by liking the fate-seeking, self-analysing hero and heroine, he will end by being charmed with their history.

Hilary's love story is a very simple affair. She falls in love with her brother's tutor, and he, when he can afford to marry, tells her that he, too, loves her. The first event takes place in the second chapter, the last on the last page. The intervening portion of the book is mainly occupied with the conversation of these two persons. It is natural and sometimes improving. The story does not demand much notice. Like most of Miss Craik's tales, it is perfectly unobjectionable; its tone is good if anything; it is not didactic; and it is written in unaffected language. But, like the previous volumes of this series, 'Hilary's Love Story' does not quite answer the expectations formed from the announcement with which the publishers began the "Blue Bell Series." It is a book for girls, and will not in any way compete with the ordinary three-volume novel. Nor does it in England at all correspond to the one-volume novels published in France. Moreover, the price is by no means low. No doubt the type is good and the paper thick—too thick, in fact, for convenience, for it bursts the binding in one reading; but compared with the railway editions at the same price, a volume of the "Blue Bell Series" is about twice as expensive. The publishers' design as announced was excellent. It is to be sincerely hoped that they may in time see their way to carry it out.

The Girl with the Golden Locks, and other Stories. (Same publishers.)

Heather and Harbell are two little boys whose life and adventures on a fine Devonshire moor will be much read by the young children for whom they are related. The illustrations are good, and the moral is healthy, showing how a manly and obedient lad may influence a less robust playmate.

In spite of the author's good intentions we fear that childish critics will find 'Grandmother's Recollections' rather "goody-goody." There is too much harping on the dangers of the water, to which most children take like ducks, and generally too much metaphorical water thrown upon everything in the direction of adventure. But some of the tales are passable, and the "pictures" are pretty.

Mrs. Hamilton's children have a good deal of fun altogether with their excellent uncle "Bobbie-Tom," who is better than his name. The burning of their house is a trouble not without its alleviations. Being lost in the fog on Arthur's Seat is an experience which certainly few children could have survived. A good many quotations in verse are put in requisition, notably that curious ballad which begins with the characteristic line, "Our fathers were high-minded men."

The fisherman of Rhava, who gains the wished-for shoon of Eilan as the reward of a life of self-sacrifice, is an allegorical figure. His adventures will be appreciated by boys, though possibly they may miss the allegory. It is a very circuitous method of impressing a doctrine which has often been more plainly, and not less poetically, conveyed.

Mrs. Wigley's book, though replete with truisms, one can well imagine may be useful to young wives and mothers, especially of the artisan class. It contains a good many sound remarks on health and morals, some simple medical recipes, and some good precepts both for housewives and mistresses.

'In Mischievous Again' is a bright, boyish story. With the hero most boys will sympathize, for there is nothing mawkish in his nature. His reclamation from the paths of pure mischief is natural, as he has some manly groundwork of character to work upon. The moral is unspoiled, and the story will win boyish sympathies.

The "nest" is a wretched garret in one of the worst parts of Liverpool, and the "sparrows" are three poor little waifs and strays of the great town who, by strange and merciful chance, are kept from the evil that is around them, and, after a hard struggle, at last work their way into decent comfort and well-doing. Jim is an Irish boy, a worker in the mills, a stunted and delicate lad, who is left at the death of his parents to support himself and his baby sister. The boy manages to earn enough to feed the two mouths, but his great difficulty is the care of little Lizzie, for he resolves, whatever happens, not to let her come under the evil influence of their bad neighbours. The tiny girl, locked up all day in the bare and lonely room, is a touching picture. In time another waif comes to their rescue—Jenny, a homeless outcast, just big enough to take care of Lizzie—and becomes the little house-mother. The three children struggle on, the elder two always hoping to raise themselves, until trouble comes in the shape of dangerous illness to Lizzie, their little savings are swallowed up, and there is despair. How kind people come to the rescue and how the memory of a hymn brings the children good luck is a long tale and worth the reading.

The writer of 'What Girls can Do' has undertaken a difficult task. Saddened by the thought of the time and powers wasted by the young women of the day, she sets forth, at length and in detail, all the works, "for duty," "for pleasure," and "for necessity," which may be accomplished by young people with time on their hands. Many of the remarks—as, for instance, on household management and on philanthropic work—are excellent, but a good many are, to say the least, inadequate. In the chapter on arithmetic we find, for example, "Of course, the first thing is to get a child to take in the idea of one—one chair, one table, one book, one horse. A week or a fortnight may be very profitably spent in going over and over this lesson. When the child really comprehends it, one and one, or two, may be introduced. . . . Once make a child realize clearly the idea first of one, and then that one and one make two, and you may go on by easy gradations to rule of three, compound interest, and the higher mathematics." The mind positively quails at this picture. We are almost tempted to think that it would be better for the unemployed young woman to remain unemployed for a week or a fortnight than to spend her time in thus stupefying a child's mind and deceiving her own. But the writer herself says, "I have taken a variety of employments into consideration. It is obvious that I could not speak from personal acquaintance with each one." It is probable that with regard to teaching she has little experience to go upon. But notwithstanding an occasional lack of intelligence and the general absence of all pretensions to literary skill, the book is well meaning, and may be of use.

The other books on our list are all reprints from volumes of Messrs. Cassell's periodicals—Little Folks, Cassell's Magazine, and the Quiver—which are now out of print, and will doubtless be welcomed by their old friends. They are children's stories and are chiefly about children. The adventures of "poor Nelly" will be followed with interest by many little readers, who will probably wonder with us at the apparently aimless villainy of Jane Snooks. 'Poor Nelly' has pretty illustrations, some few of which seem to be by a well-known hand. The other books contain less attractive pictures, though the head-pieces and tailpieces are generally good.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

ALTHOUGH it is the business of a critic to judge a work according to its intrinsic merits, he is not the less bound, in fairness both to the author and to his readers, to call attention to any exceptional difficulties which may have attended its production. Accordingly in noticing the second series of Mr. W. W. Fenn's collected papers, After Sundown; or, the Palette and the Pen, in two volumes (Sampson Low & Co.), we gladly recall the fact of his gallant struggle against a great misfortune, related in his former work, and referred to in the present, which must dispose any generous mind in his favour. Mr. Fenn's most successful productions are certainly those which spring most directly and spontaneously from his reminiscences. His sketches of the joys and troubles—the former by far predominating—of a landscape painter's life and work during the sketching season have all the freshness and value of personal experience; the descriptions of scenery which has remained so long graven on the mental retina alone are vivid and artistic. But though a lover of nature in all its aspects he is also a true Cockney, and he sings the praises of noise in a discriminating account of the sounds of London. A paper entitled 'Rifle and Brush' contains a pleasant description of his experiences with the Artists' corps in the early days of the volunteer movement, and on the subject of holidays he has some sensible, if not very original, remarks. His stories, though varied enough, have a strong family likeness. All are more or less sensational (his "acute sensational story" is perhaps a less distant parody on them than he imagines). The dialogue is generally of the same order, and almost everything turns on a violently improbable coincidence—a defect which, though of less consequence when each story appeared by itself, is necessarily forced on the reader by their juxtaposition. The tales are very short, and we are inclined to think their effect would have been better had they been somewhat longer. Whether these stories, and certain other papers which as to matter and calibre recall that prolific and most respectable writer A. K. H. B., are worth reprinting, can be decided only by that roughest of all tests, success. We think success is probable, and in one sense at all events is richly deserved. Let us keep our tempers—let us make the best of things—above all, let us not be snobs. Certainly the teaching of these moral essays is unexceptionable. And there is a large number of excellent people who like truth best in the form of a truism, not to say a platitude. But the author's best sermon by far is his life, as revealed to the reader in occasional though direct glimpses throughout these as well as his former volumes.

Index Catalogue of the Library of the Surgeon-General's Office, United States Army, is the title of a big volume of 888 pages recently published by the Government at Washington. It combines authors and subjects in alphabetical order from A to Berlinsk, an arrangement distasteful to the traditional librarian, but in this instance, by confronting a long-standing difficulty, productive of a very useful book. The compilers have evidently taken a lesson from the 'Catalogue of Scientific Papers' brought out by the Royal Society, for they print 136 pages of abbreviated titles of Transactions and other periodicals, out of which they have gathered 34,604 titles of papers and articles, besides 9,000 author-titles representing 8,031 volumes and 6,398 pamphlets, and 9,000 subject-titles of separate books and minor publications. This for a first instalment is very praiseworthy, and makes us impatient to see what the whole work will be when Z is reached. Lieut.-Col and Surgeon J. S. Billings, U.S. Army, whose report is printed as preface, tells us that the work was begun in 1873; that it is not to be regarded as a complete medical bibliography, inasmuch as it represents a single collection only, but "a collection so large and of such a character that there are few subjects in medicine with regard to which something may not be found in it"; and he hopes that "the many physicians, both in America and in Europe, to whom the library is under obligations for contributions and influence, will find in the volume a proof that their aid and sympathy have not been wasted."

Messrs. W. Kent & Co. are continuing their laudable enterprise—the publication of neat pocket editions of English classics. They now send us an edition of Shakespeare, twelve small volumes in a cloth case. The volumes are so small that they can without inconvenience be carried in the pocket. They are printed in a nice clear type, and will form an excellent Christmas present.

Messrs. Partridge & Cooper have sent us a selection of Diaries, excellently adapted for the wear and tear of business, strongly bound and well arranged.—We have also on our table The Cosmopolitan Masonic Calendar and Diary (Kenning), which, as its title shows, will interest Freemasons.

Here Rothe has sent us a number of interesting Christmas Cards. The floral designs are the most successful.

SONNETS.

NATURA MORTUA.

- THE Lady of the Hills with crimes untold*
 Followed my feet, with azure eyes of prey;
 By glacier-brink she stood, or cataract-spray,
 When mists were dire, or avalanche-echoes rolled.
 At night she glimmered in the death-wind cold,
 And if a footprint shone at break of day,
 My flesh would quail, but straight my soul would Tis hers whose hand God's mightier hand doth hold.
 I trod her snow-bridge, for the moon was bright,
 Her icicle-arch across the sheer crevasse,
 When lo, she stood! God bade her let me pass;
 Then fell the bridge; and in the shallow light
 Adown the chasm, I saw her, cruel-white,
 And all my wondrous days as in a glass.
- THEODORE WATTS.

THE TWOFOLD CORD.

SINGLY we fight against enormous odds,— Dulness, and Cowardice, and Fate, and Chance,
 And the wild bowman, purblind Ignorance,
 And Heaven with all its lazy brood of gods;
 How, then, above the congregated clods,
 Can one man rise, and out of clay advance,
 Alone, against the sleepless countenance
 Of that huge Argus-host that never nods?
 So must we fall upon the fields of life,
 And bleed, and die? Nay, rather let us twain,
 Marching abreast, against that army move,
 Each harnessing the other for the strife,—
 You with my will for helmet, and my brain
 For sword, while I for buckler bear your love.

THE TWOFOLD VOICE.

A DOUBLE voice cries in the spirit of Man,
 As though upon a mortal stage he saw Apollo's wailing daughter, crazed with awe, Change parts, and shout as Clytemnestra can;
 For in the blaze of life he turns to scan
 The dim ghost-haunted face of outraged law,
 And feels the flames rise, and the serpents gnaw
 Through the gilt tissue of his hope's bright plan;
 And thus the heavy animal part of him,
 Never at rest to ponder and rejoice,— Sways, blindly shaken by that twofold voice;
 Beneath the axe of Pleasure, void and dim
 The dull brain reels, and the vert senses swim,
 Or Conscience thrills him with her piercing noise.

EDMUND W. GUEST.

DR. EDWIN GUEST.

As was announced in the Athenæum for Nov. 27th, the resignation of Dr. Guest, which took place but a very short time ago, was followed by his death last week. It is about a year and a half since Dr. Guest took any part in the business of the University, as his health, which had for some years been feeble, began to fail very seriously. He left Cambridge for his estate at Sandford, near Oxford, and it soon became evident that he would return to his college no more. Finding this, Dr. Guest, on the 8th of October last, resigned the mastership which he had held for twenty-eight years.

Dr. Guest was born in 1800, entered Caius College in 1820, and took his degree as eleventh wrangler in the Mathematical Tripos of 1824, the same year as the late Lord Hatherley. He was elected Fellow of his college, and, having chosen the law as his profession, he was called to the bar; but his tastes were literary and antiquarian rather than legal, and, holding his fellowship, he was free to follow those studies on which he became so great an authority.

His 'History of English Rhythms' was published in 1838, and is, as was said long since, "unhappily the only book, strictly so called, that this great scholar has put forth." It was given to the world at a time when all the labour of examining the MSS. of our old English poetry had to be borne by the author himself. Since that day societies have arisen to place abundant materials at the disposal of any writer on that or kindred subjects. But Dr. Guest was his own collector, and most zealously and carefully he did his work. The first volume had been printed off two years before the second went to press, and in his brief preface he apologizes for the few additional notes at the end of each volume, which further examination had rendered necessary. But any one who looks over these notes, and observes the slight modification of judgment they exhibit, will at once recognize the careful work which, in a field then comparatively unknown, had left so little to be altered, and will be able to appreciate the pains that Dr. Guest bestowed on everything he wrote.

If, however, he issued no more books, the late Master was ever diligent in investigating, and writing on, subjects connected with the early history and literature of our country. The learned historian of the Norman Conquest, than whom few can judge more accurately of the worth of Dr. Guest's labours, speaks of him as, on these subjects, "one of the first of living scholars." Dr. Guest's contributions to the history of England and the English are to be found scattered about in such works as the Archæological Journal and the Transactions of the Archæological Institute, and in the Proceedings of other antiquarian societies. Perhaps the best known among them is his valuable essay on the 'Early English Settlements in South Britain.' But this is only one out of a great number, to give even a list of which would occupy considerable space. We subjoin the titles of a few of them, that the earnest labours of a diligent student and great scholar may be recalled to the minds of those who value such work as Dr. Guest has left behind him. He wrote 'On Earthworks in Britain,' 'On the English Conquest of the Severn Valley,' 'On Julius Cæsar's Invasion of Britain' (an essay in which the late Emperor Napoleon was greatly interested), 'On the Saxon Conquest of West Britain,' 'On the Boundary-Dykes of Cambridgeshire,' 'On the Campaign of Aulus Plautius,' 'On the Four Roman Ways,' 'On the "Belgic Ditches" and on the Probable Date of Stonehenge,' 'On the Boundaries that separated the Welsh and English Races during the Seventy-five Years which followed the Capture of Bath, A.D. 577,' and numerous other papers. It is much to be wished that these could be collected, and there could hardly be a more fitting memorial of the late Master than such a collection of his scattered works, to say nothing of the boon which would be bestowed in this way on students of early English history. Indeed, it was Dr. Guest's intention to have himself gathered them together.

The late Master was elected in 1852, on the death of Dr. Chapman, and in the following year took the degree of LL.D. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1841, and the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L. He married in 1859, and has left a widow, but no children. He was Vice-Chancellor of the University in 1854, but his studies made him more known to scholars at a distance than within the academic body. His death was alluded to in a few eloquent and touching sentences after the sermon in St. Mary's last Sunday by the Bishop of Long Island. He was buried on Tuesday last at Sandford, whither the new Master (the Rev. N. M. Ferrers) and some of the Fellows went to pay their last tribute of respect to one whose work has been of that high character which they achieve who work from love of their labour.

THE PROVINCIAL PRESS

Nov. 30, 1880.

As a supplement to the remarks of Mr. W. Hunt in a recent number of your journal, criticizing portions of the article on 'The Newspaper Press' in the October number of the Quarterly Review, and amplifying the statements of the writer on several matters, permit me to add a few observations relating to partly-printed news sheets. The writer of the article in the Quarterly Review states that the originator of these sheets was Mr. W. Eglinton, of Bartholomew Close. This is incorrect. Partly-printed sheets were being supplied to newspaper proprietors several years before Mr. Eglinton embarked in this particular business.

I have recently been in communication with the proprietors of several London and provincial journals on the subject, and the result of the correspondence is that I have no hesitation in asserting that the honour of introducing partly-printed news sheets in this country belongs to a company that was formed in London for the purpose in the year 1850, and which bore the name of the Champion News Company, of which Mr. Hans Buek was the principal member. Before Mr. Eglinton was in business this company was supplying sheets to the Dover Telegraph, Herford Guardian, and the Cirencester and Swindon Express, afterwards amalgamated with the Wiltshire and Gloucestershire Standard. By means of the partly-printed newspaper system many small towns now possess journals that would doubtless be unrepresented in the newspaper world had not the system been originated in consequence of the great expense and risk attending the entire production of a journal. By means of these sheets newspaper proprietors are enabled to give their readers as much reading matter as the proprietors of old-established papers, and sheets equal in size. However, it is generally found, when a newspaper has secured a moderate advertising revenue and an increasing circulation, that the partly-printed system is to a great extent a barrier to the further progress of the journal. This arises in consequence of the limited space at the disposal of the local editor, and the fact that the order for the sheets has to be given several days before the parcels are despatched from London. Great inconvenience is thus experienced in supplying extra orders and in meeting demands for copies when events of great local importance transpire. There can be no doubt the present system of partly printed news sheets is capable of great improvement and still further development. As a rule, the intelligence in the best-compiled partly-printed sheet is, comparatively speaking, old news, the most recent items referring to events that have transpired several days before the publication of the paper. Each of the three firms that now supply partly-printed sheets discard dates and days in the reports and the paragraphs they print, so that the majority of readers know not whether they are reading recent or old news. This arises in consequence of utilization of the same news for papers that are published on different days in each week. In justice to advertisers and the proprietors of newspapers that are entirely produced "at home," I think that Messrs. Mitchell & Co. should in future issues of their admirably compiled Newspaper Press Directory indicate the partly-printed newspapers from the others. As the partly-printed system has done so much during the past thirty years in giving an impetus to provincial journalism, facts appertaining to its origin cannot be otherwise than interesting to the large number of persons who are directly associated with the press, and the still larger number who place no mere sentimental value upon its history. As a slight contribution towards a complete record of that history, and in the hope that further information will be afforded on the partly-printed newspaper system by others, I have ventured to make these few observations.

TASMANIAN FRIENDS AND FOES.

61, Chandos Street, Nov. 30, 1880.

ALLOW us to refer briefly to one point in the review of Mrs. Meredith's book which appears in your last issue. Your reviewer, in alluding to the coloured plates of certain Tasmanian fishes, most naturally throws doubt upon the vividness of the colouring being true to life. The same doubt presented itself to us when we received the original water-colour drawings, the colours being so remarkably brilliant. Mrs. Meredith, however, informed us—and she is such an admirable observer that on such a subject it is hardly possible to question her accuracy—that when alive the colouring of these fishes quite defied the utmost resources of her paint-box to properly portray them in all their lustre and brightness. We merely reproduced, as closely as the mechanical process would permit, the wonderfully brilliant water-colour drawings placed in our hands.

MARCUS WARD & Co.

"STELLA" (B. A. LEWIS).

ANOTHER of Edgar Poe's rapidly diminishing troop of friends has just passed away, and in a shockingly sudden manner. "Stella," as she desired to be called, the authoress of 'Sappho, a Tragedy,' now in its sixth edition, 'The Records of the Heart,' the eleventh edition of which work is on the eve of publication, 'The Child of the Sea,' 'The Myths of the Minstrels,' and several other works in prose and verse, died last Wednesday, the 24th of November, at Bedford Place, W.C. She had been seen in the library of the British Museum on Tuesday, the 23rd, apparently in good health, but arrived home in the evening suffering severely. Medical advice was obtained, but so little was danger apprehended that she was left unattended during the night, and in the morning was found dead in her bed. Her many friends in London have been doubly grieved by the fact that her sudden death should have taken place in the very way which, many years ago, she had foreboded in her poem of 'The Forsaken':—

It hath been said—for all who die
There is a tear;
Some pining, bleeding heart to sigh
O'er every bier,
But in that hour of pain and dread,
Who will draw near Around my humble couch and shed
One farewell tear?

Her funeral took place on Monday, the 29th ult., at Kensal Green Cemetery; there the body will find a temporary resting-place, prior to its removal to Greenwood Cemetery, New York. Mr. Hoppin, Secretary to the United States Legation, was present, as were also several private and literary friends of the deceased, but, owing to no notification of the time and place of interment having been given, many who would have liked to attend were absent.

JOHN H. INGRAM.

40, Marlborough Hill, St. John's Wood, Nov. 27, 1880.

THE copy of 'Queen Mab' sold by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson was probably bought as a document having a place in Shelley history; both the buyer and the underbidder knew from me that the writing was not Mrs. Shelley's. It will be remembered the Shelley biographer Middleton announced the revision of 'Queen Mab' for publication. Mr. Garnett, who has examined this copy more closely than I have, tells me there is a note against one of the revisions signed "C. S. M.," the initials of Middleton. We may presume, therefore, that it was he who took the pains to make this transcript; but I do not know his handwriting.

H. BUXTON FORMAN.

Literary Gossip.

As the papers have been announcing various sums from 10,000*l.* to 30,000*l.* as the price paid for 'Endymion,' it may be as well to say that Lord Beaconsfield will eventually receive 10,000*l.* It may also be added, for the benefit of the curious, that the novel was begun some ten years ago. Our statement that the subscription amounts to 7,000 copies is, despite assertions to the contrary, correct.

MR. CHARLES MARVIN, the author of 'The Disastrous Turcoman Campaign' and 'Grodokoff's Ride to Herat,' has completed this week a new volume, entitled 'Merv, the Queen of the World, and the Scourge of the Man-stealing Turcomans.' Besides containing a history of Merv and the Turcomans, the work embodies all that has been written by English and Russian travellers about the Turcomans, including an account of Akhal and Merv by General Petrovitch, now governor of Krasnovodak; and a military description of Merv, and the Turkestan march-routes thither, by Col. Kostenko, chief of Kaufmann's staff at Tashkent. None of the latter information has yet been placed before the English reader. Petrovitch's description of a short, easy road from Askabat to Merv, avoiding Rawlinson's route past Sarakhs, and his account of Russian annexation in Khorassan, are likely to occasion some sensation. Mr. Marvin appends to his compilation an exposition of the Khorassan question, showing that Russia has designs on Meshed as well as on Merv, and that the solution of the Russo-Indian frontier question cannot be accomplished without an English occupation of Herat! Ten maps accompany the work, a Turcoman glossary, and a Turcoman chronology from the foundation of Merv to the present time. Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. have arranged with the author for its immediate publication.

MR. LAURENCE OLIPHANT'S 'Land of Gilead,' of which we made mention some time ago, will be out next week. It contains an account of the author's recent travels in the Lebanon, and his explorations on the east of the Jordan, with a view to the settlement of Jewish colonies under a scheme of limited liability. The desired concession has not yet been secured from the Porte, but Mr. Oliphant's observations on the much-neglected resources of Palestine will be read with interest. Messrs. Blackwood are the publishers.

THE Hon. Lewis Wingfield has almost completed a romance, the title of which is to be 'The Haven of Unrest.' In this he will try to show the rottenness of the lunacy laws and the evils of private lunatic asylums. With a view to working into his plot (which is more dramatic than that of his previous work, 'In Her Majesty's Keeping') true sketches of character, Mr. Wingfield has been studying carefully in Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, and other asylums, public and private, in various parts of the country, and has been shut up daily for many hours with different patients. Arrangements have been made for the appearance of the work in a series of newspapers, English and German. This will retard until next autumn its publication in the customary three-volume form.

We are requested to state that Miss Rhoda Broughton has no connexion whatever with Mrs. Reeves's new magazine, The Burlington. A new fortnightly journal will appear on the 6th of January next. It is to be devoted specially to the interests of charities and works of philanthropy. The title of the new paper will be The Charity Record and Philanthropic News.

'THE NEW VIRGINIANS,' by the author of 'Estelle Russell,' which Messrs. Blackwood advertise, has, it seems, nothing to do with Thackeray's novel, and is an account of the life of English settlers in the Southern States. The tone of the work is not complimentary to the American eagle.

MESSRS. C. KEAN PAUL & Co. have in the press a 'Guide to the Study of English History.' The first part, which is by Prof. S. R. Gardiner, consists of a sketch of the social and political progress of the country, in which special attention is directed to those new ideas which have from time to time exercised the most marked influence on the development of the nation. The second part, which is by Mr. J. Bass Mullinger, is designed to furnish a concise critical account of the original sources, and also of the best modern authorities, for our knowledge of successive periods. The object of the whole work is to meet the requirements of those who, having already gone through the ordinary handbooks, are desirous of making the history of their country the subject of more thorough and systematic study.

Lippincott's Magazine is now edited by Mr. John Foster Kirk, author of the 'History of Charles the Bold,' and for many years private secretary to the distinguished historian W. H. Prescott.

A NEW story by the author of 'Ginx's Baby,' &c., will shortly appear in the weekly edition of the Leeds Mercury.

THE November number of Robert Weber's Helvetia contains an original letter from Goethe to Prof. Hottinger, of Zürich. It was found at Berne amongst the archives of the short-lived Helvetic Government, and is dated 1799.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT have, like Messrs. Blackwood, in the press a work of travel in the Holy Land, entitled 'Our Holiday in the East,' from the pen of Mrs. George Sumner, to be edited by the Rev. G. H. Sumner, Hon. Canon of Winchester, and Rector of Old Alresford. A new novel called 'Fixed as Fate,' by Mrs. Houstoun, author of 'Recommended to Mercy,' &c., will be published this month by the same firm.

THE first volume of a 'History of China,' by Mr. Demetrius Boulger, is announced for publication early in January. It concludes with the fall of the Yuen or Mongol dynasty. The author's principal object is to popularize the subject for the general reader at the same time that the facts are stated in greater detail than in any other history, with, of course, the exception of Mailla's voluminous work. It will be dedicated, by permission, to Sir Rutherford Alcock.

EARLY in February Messrs. Williams & Norgate will publish the first two volumes of a new work by Mr. Gerald Massey, upon which he has been engaged for ten years. It is to be entitled 'A Book of the Beginnings; containing an Attempt to recover and reconstitute the lost Origins of the Myths and Mysteries, Types and Symbols, Religion and Language, with Egypt for the Mouthpiece and Africa as the Birthplace.' The first volume will contain Egyptian Origins in the British Isles; the second Egyptian Origins in the Hebrew, Akkado-Assyrian, and Maori mythology and languages.

MR. GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA has written an amusing Introduction to yet another annual, to be issued in a few days, 'The Showman's Panorama.' Mr. Sala says:—

"The Showman's Panorama," to begin with, is a reproduction of the choicest cartoons and light lectures wherewith 'The Showman' has for more than two years yielded amusement to an immeasurably large circle; and it may be at once stated that the idea of 'The Showman' originated with Mr. Lathey (otherwise 'Codlin'), whose newsy notions for each sketch in the Show are so happily and divertingly delineated by the clever pencil of Mr. Wallis Mackay. So be pleased to take note, ladies and gentlemen, that both Codlin and Short are the friends in 'The Showman's Panorama.'"

SCIENCE

A Popular History of Science. By Robert Routledge, B.Sc. (Routledge & Sons.)

To write a history tracing the development of the various branches of natural and experimental science in such a way as to be intelligible to the general reader is an undertaking which requires not only a good deal of scientific preparation, but considerable literary tact. If the writer be tempted to follow his subject too far into detail, he may secure the sympathy of the specialist, but the ordinary reader closes the book in despair, if not in disgust. If, on the other hand, he merely skims the surface of his subject, he is sure to bring down the wrath of his scientific friends. It is pleasing to find that Mr. Routledge has skillfully contrived to follow a middle course. On first looking at his book we were inclined to think that he had erred in the direction of popularization. The gilding on the cover and the nature of some of the illustrations produced an impression not favourable to the scientific character of the work. But on carefully examining the volume it became clear that the author possessed a wide and exact knowledge of science. Whatever he happens to be writing about—he is the Cartesian geometry on one page or the Darwinian hypothesis on another—he gains the confidence of the reader by showing that he has a firm grip of his subject. His 'History' is not, of course, to be compared with such a work as Whewell's, but it is, nevertheless, a very useful volume: substantial without being tedious, and attractive without being vulgar or puerile. In the first chapter the writer deals with early Greek science, from Thales to Theophrastus. By the way, we may fairly complain of a little injustice to Theophrastus, inasmuch as he is here mentioned only as a botanist, while in truth his treatise 'On Stones' is the earliest mineralogical work which we possess. Mr. Routledge notices in succession the Alexandrian Greek, the Arabians, and the Medieval schools of science; but, for the rest, the classification is rather obscure. Part of the subject is arranged under successive centuries, from the sixteenth to the nineteenth, and part under the names of epoch-making men, such as Galileo, Bacon, and Newton. In fact, a strong feature in the work is the introduction of short biographical notices of eminent men of science. The author has thus imported into his work an element of human interest, and has found an opportunity for embellishing his pages with a large number of portraits. Although these are not altogether unsatisfactory, it would have been better if there had been fewer of such engravings, and if a little more care had been bestowed upon their execution. In closing the book we do not hesitate to say that any educated reader, without being a scientific specialist, may readily gain from its pages a clear insight into many of the great scientific questions of the day. He will here find, for example, short but sound descriptions of such modern subjects as spectrum analysis, the dynamical theory of heat, the new chemical philosophy, and the doctrine of organic evolution. To an intelligent lad with scientific leanings few books would be more acceptable, or more likely to bear fruit, than Mr. Routledge's 'Popular History of Science.'

OUR FORTHCOMING COLOURED EDITION

THE son of Sir Benjamin Brodie, the celebrated surgeon, and the second baronet of the same name, died on Wednesday, the 24th of November, at Torquay, Devonshire, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

Benjamin Collins Brodie was born in London in the year 1817. He was educated at Harrow under Dr. Longley, and afterwards took his Bachelor's degree at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1839, and became M.A. in 1842. He was appointed Professor of Chemistry in the University of Oxford in 1855, and was President of the Chemical Society in the years 1859 and 1860. Mr. Brodie was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society on the 7th of June, 1843, and that body awarded to him the Royal Medal in 1880. In 1862 he succeeded to his father's title, and he was created a D.C.L. in 1872.

In the 'Catalogue of Scientific Papers' published by the Royal Society we find Sir Benjamin Collins Brodie credited with twenty-five important memoirs and papers on various chemical subjects, one of the most important being 'On the Calculus of Chemical Operations,' which was read before the Royal Society on the 3rd of May, 1860. This was a method for the investigation by means of symbols of the laws of the distribution of weight in chemical change, the first part of which occupied seventy-eight pages of the quarto volume of the Philosophical Transactions. About a year after this he delivered a lecture before the Chemical Society, in which he gave a very clear abstract of his views on this branch of chemical philosophy. A period of thirteen years was allowed to elapse, when, under the title of 'Ideal Chemistry,' he published a volume which is a philosophical examination of, and an exceedingly clever attempt to establish, the hypothesis to account for the existence of the more simple forms of matter, the laws regulating the combinations of matter with matter, and the existence of matter in space. Prof. Brodie says himself, "This method is quite independent of any atomic hypothesis as to the nature of the material world." "This method may be regarded as a special application of the science of algebra, and in its construction I have been guided by the similar applications of that science to geometry, to probabilities, and to logic." His views may be gathered from the following summary. "We talk of elemental bodies as though they were existing things... but where is hydrogen, or chlorine, or fluorine? They are locked up in such a way that it is only within the last hundred years that the art of the chemist has revealed them to mankind." Prof. Brodie's investigations 'On the Allotropic Changes of Certain Elements,' 'On the Formation of Hydrogen and its Homologues,' 'On the Action of Iodine upon Phosphorus,' and 'On the Reduction of the Metallic Oxides by the Peroxide of Barium,' all of which are published in the Transactions of the Royal Society, give strong evidence of the tendency, so strikingly marked in the above extract, of Prof. Brodie's mind towards transcendental physics.

In the Annales de Chimie for 1855 he published a 'Note sur un Nouveau Procédé pour la Purification et la Désagrégation du Graphite.' In this he showed that graphite, although unalterable when heated in closed vessels, and in other points resembling the ordinary forms of carbon, differed essentially from them when subjected to the action of certain oxidizing agents, being converted into a peculiar acid—graphitic acid. The importance of this drew considerable attention to the discovery at the time. It was thought, too, to place in the hands of the manufacturer a process for purifying graphite so as to fit it as refined plumbago for the pencil manufacturer. Beyond this the inquiry led to a new determination of the atomic weight of graphite.

We hope we have in this short notice sufficiently shown the exalted nature of Prof. Brodie's mind. He would, had he been subjected to severer training, have become a far-seeing philosopher, and probably have advanced his science, beyond the purely inductive state in which chemistry exhausts itself, to a system of enlarged deductions, from which alone we can hope for any grand discoveries as to the constitution of matter.

THE 'ZOOLOGICAL RECORD' FOR 1880.

MAY I be permitted, with reference to the presumed "extraordinary oversight" on the part of Mr. O'Shaughnessy in ranging the Batrachia under the heading "Reptilia," mentioned in the notice of the Record in the Athenæum of November 20th, to point out that it was no oversight at all, as the recorder has followed the plan originally adopted by his predecessor, Dr. Günther, for mechanical convenience in various ways? As regards confusion of the Amphibia and Reptilia in the nineteenth century, the two groups are still ranged by Troschel under one heading in the corresponding continental record of long standing, viz., Wiegmann's Archiv für Naturgeschichte. Dr. Peters, whose authority as a herpetologist is unquestionable, in one of his most recent papers (Monatsschrift Ak. Wiss. Berlin, March, 1880, p. 305), also ranges under one name, "Amphibien," tortoises, lizards, serpents, and frogs.

E. C. RYS, editor Zoological Record.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

THE subject of the next evening meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, December 13th, will be a paper 'On the Geographical Results of the Afghan Campaign,' by Capt. T. H. Holdich, R.E., chief survey officer during the recent military expeditions. Mr. Leigh Smith's recent discoveries in Franz Josef Land will be discussed on the 17th of January next. A map of his explorations is to appear in the Mittheilungen.

'The Voyage of the Vega,' giving an account of Baron Nordenskiöld's experiences and observations in the accomplishment of the North-East Passage, is now in the press, and will be published in Swedish, at Stockholm, as a handsome work, containing several hundred illustrations besides maps and engraved portraits. The work will be translated into English by Mr. Alexander Leslie, of Aberdeen, who is the author of a volume giving an account of the previous voyages of the well-known Swedish arctic and Arctic explorer. An edition in French will be published by Hachette & Co., Paris; one in German, by F. A. Brockhaus, Leipzig; one in Danish, at Copenhagen; one in Finnish, by the Finnish Literary Society; one in Polish, at Warsaw; a Dutch version, at Amsterdam; a Spanish, at Barcelona, and one in Italian, at Milan. Negotiations; it is understood, are also in progress for a Czech edition.

It has been finally resolved by the General Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund to complete the survey of the Holy Land by extending it to the east of the Jordan. An expedition will be organized and sent out as soon as the Committee can make arrangements.

The success of Dr. Lenz's journey to Timbuktu (Athen. No. 2767) is considered mainly attributable to his having secured for his travelling companion Hadj Ali, nephew of Abd-el-Kader. Major Laing was the first to reach Timbuktu in 1826, but he was murdered, and two years later M. René Caillié was the first to bring an account of it to Europe, while Dr. Barth spent some months there in 1853-4. Dr. Lenz, it will be remembered, was originally commissioned by the German African Society to carry out explorations, chiefly of a geological nature, in the Atlas Mountains. Dr. Lenz reached Medina on the 2nd of November. He is returning via Senegal, as his life was threatened should he attempt to return by the way he came.

Dr. Junker is reported to have reached the residence of King Ndoruma, in the Niam-niam country. He writes hopefully of his chances of reaching Adamaua, a country far to the south, said to be inhabited by Mohammedans.

With reference to the note in our last issue on the subject of Dr. Matteucci's expedition to Central Africa, it may be well to mention that a telegram has reached Alexandria to the effect that Dr. Matteucci has succeeded in traversing Wadai, and is making his way north to Tripoli. Lieut. Massari is presumably with him, but Prince Giovanni Borghese, who bears the expenses of the expedition, is on his way back to Cairo.

Mr. Pinkerton, an agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, has lately gone from British South Africa to found a mission station in the mountainous region near Tsamatahama, in Umsila's country. Should his expedition prove successful we may expect a large addition to our knowledge of this little-known but interesting region.

A rumour has reached Havre, where she was equipped for her voyage, that the American Arctic exploring vessel Jeannette has been totally lost, after having been cut through by the ice. The information had been obtained from natives, and brought to Petropaulovsk by a vessel returning from the whale fishery, and thence it was conveyed to Hakodadi. Though the disaster is by no means improbable, the news, of course, requires confirmation.

Mr. Oswald J. Cattley, the first Englishman to trade with Siberia via the Kara Sea, has just left England to undertake an overland journey to the Obi Gulf. His object is to make preparations and arrangements for a regular trade next summer through the Kara Sea with the Siberian river system. Mr. Cattley contributed an interesting letter on this subject to the October number of the Royal Geographical Society's Proceedings.

The Director of the Magnetic and Meteorological Observatory of Zi-ka-wei, China, has for some time endeavoured to associate a large number of stations in observation of weather and of storms, taking for example the systematic method of the Weather Department of the United States Government, and of the Meteorological Office in this country. In the May number of his monthly Bulletin he makes known that forty-four stations are now in co-operation, twelve of which are the principal lighthouses on the coast of Japan. From the observations already accumulated a remarkable similarity is found between the storms of the North Atlantic and of the North Pacific; the general direction of the one as of the other being from west to east with a slight deviation to north east, and their range comprised between the thirtieth and fiftieth parallels. Moreover, the direction of Chinese typhoons corresponds to that of Atlantic hurricanes, namely, from south to north. With East and West engaged in the same good work we may hope that our knowledge of the meteorology of the northern hemisphere will be largely increased and rectified. The observations made at the stations above referred to are discussed at Zi-ka-wei, and with every monthly Bulletin will be published a chart showing a portion of the track of each storm observed.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Nov. 21.—The President in the chair—Mr. Beresford-Hope was admitted into the Society; the Master of the Rolls was elected a Fellow.—The following papers were read: 'On the Chemical Composition of Aleurone Grains, II,' by Mr. S. H. Vines; 'On the Ossification of the Terminal Phalanges of the Digits,' by Mr. F. A. Dixer; 'On a Sun-spot observed August 31st, 1880,' by Mr. J. N. Lockyer; and 'On Methods of preparing Selenium and other Substances for Photophonic Experiments,' by Prof. G. Bell.

Nov. 30.—Anniversary Meeting.—The President in the chair.—The report of the auditors, showing a satisfactory balance-sheet, was presented.—In delivering his address, the President stated that in the past session more papers had been sent in for reading than in any previous session; that the change in the hour of the Society's ordinary meetings from 8.30 P.M. to 4.30 had met with general approval and increased the attendance; that in the administration of the Government Fund of £4,000, "one of the points which is perhaps beset with the greatest difficulty is that of the so-called personal grants"; that the Royal Commission on Accidents in Coal-Mines are still collecting evidence and trying experiments, among which is blasting rock and coal by methods which will check the production of flame; that the volume of zoological memoirs of the Challenger expedition will shortly be published; that preparations are already being made for observing the transit of Venus in 1882; and that the longitude of localities in Australia is to be determined by connecting one of the observatories, probably Adelaide, with Madras.

give some considerable aid towards synchronising the early civilizations of Troy, Mycenæ, Cyprus, and Attica. The book has claims as genuine on the attention of the admirers of the masterpiece of Greek poetry for its own sake as on the respect of those students who, indifferent to the charms of the noblest of ancient poems, turn eagerly to scrutinize new illustrations of a stage in the struggle of "unaccommodated man" to earn the title of a tool-making animal.

The sympathetic interest which his labours excite justifies Dr. Schliemann in prefixing an autobiographical sketch. The story of his life would have been well worth telling, even if his unselfish enthusiasm had been disappointed at Mycenæ and Ilium as it was at Ithaca. It is the story of a self-made man, who started from something like indigence, and acquired rapidly a considerable fortune; but also of a self-educated man, who pursued knowledge concurrently with fortune, and prized both chiefly as means for realizing an early dream of liberal ambition, and who has realized it while yet well on the better side of the grand climacteric. Mere industry and resolution and sagacity even when conjoined with fervour do not compass all this without some aid from exceptional endowments; and one of these certainly was a marvellous facility in acquiring languages. The style of this book is throughout Dr. Schliemann's own. The charm which relieves and enlivens the recital of the progress of the works, and the descriptions of the numberless objects found, is due to a frankness and earnestness that gain upon the reader, who, so far from being offended by intrusive egotism, may well be disappointed that the portrait which should ever accompany an autobiography has been withheld. As we read chapter after chapter of equable and spirited exposition, it comes upon us as a surprise to find from the essay of Dr. Virchow that the disinterested excavator was at one time exposed not merely to a perverted depreciation of the value of his startling discoveries, but to a charge so irritating as direct imputation of imposture.

The contributions of Dr. Virchow to the work of his friend are a preface, an appendix of great interest on Troy and Hissarlik, and another on Medical Practice in the Troad—an experience forced upon him ever increasingly after he had given relief to some of Dr. Schliemann's workmen. It is interesting to find that the habits of sober observation of the accomplished physicist and naturalist confirm the conclusions upon which Dr. Schliemann seemed to rush with such hasty enthusiasm as to awaken mistrust.

The basis of all discussion about the early condition of the plain of Troy is the map of Troas, from the survey of Graves and Spratt, 1840, revised and completed by Emile Burnouf, 1879, supplemented as it is by special local descriptions. The Menderes river, the ancient Scamander, issues from the mountains into the plain of the Troad about seven miles from the line of coast between the promontories Sigeum and Rhœteum. As it approaches the sea it runs so close to the line of western heights as to leave no intermediate plain of any consequence, and thus falsifies all the Homeric local indications, which give space for the ships and camp of the Greeks and the conflict of the armies on the west of the Scamander. At present we miss also the confluence of the Simois mentioned by Homer, who would thus appear to have known nothing of the locality personally, and to have owed nothing to either hearsay or genuine tradition. But the investigations of Dr. Schliemann and his friends make it clear that the river has changed its course and how it changed it; that it originally followed a channel on the eastern side of the plain, received the Simois below Ilium, and discharged by the eastern promontory of Rhœteum. The extreme interest of this conclusion lies in its vindication of the familiarity of Homer with the scene of his poem; it provides sufficient extent of shore west of the embouchure of the Scamander for the fleet to be hauled up, or rather to be described as hauled up, and for the camp, a fair battle-field on the same side of the river, and another eastward below the walls of Ilium, between the Scamander and the Simois just above their confluence. But it may seem futile to endeavour to reconcile the topography with Homer if Homer is inconsistent with himself; and this to a certain extent he is, though not quite so far as Dr. Schliemann himself is prepared to admit. Priam, on his way from the city to the camp of the Greeks, passes the river at a ford (xxiv. 351, 692). When Hector has driven the Greeks back within their wall, his army bivouacs between the Scamander and the ships (viii. 560); and when he is disabled by Ajax in the battle near the Greek wall, he is taken, on his way to the city, to the same ford and laid on the river bank (xiv. 433). When Patroclus has driven back the Trojans beyond the trench, he turns those who were foremost back again, and coops them "between the ships, the river, and the high wall" (xvi. 394). This must be the Greek wall, not that of Troy, as interpreted by Dr. Schliemann (p. 92), for otherwise Troy would be on the same side of the river as the Greek ships. But then, in the course of the battles, as fortune fluctuates, the Greeks go backwards and forwards over and over again between the ships and up to the city wall, and no mention whatever is made of crossing the river.

In the battle, which pauses for the meeting of Glaucus and Diomed, the Trojans had been driven back to the city (vi. 74), and it is quite consistent, therefore, that the fight should be described as raging between the Xanthus or Scamander and the Simois (vi. 4). Nothing, it is true, has been said of the passage of the Scamander, but the seeming neglect is no doubt due, in this case as in the others, to poetical licence; the poet chose to ignore the river here altogether, as he chose to make the most of it when he prepared a striking adventure for Achilles and depicted him as contending with it in sudden flood. Homer deals with space as unscrupulously for his purposes as with time, when, after a day unconscionably long, he represents the sun as only setting at last in consequence of being hurried by the wife of Jove. The characteristics of the stream lent themselves to such arbitrary treatment. "Although the Scamander has a large volume of water in winter and spring, it is in the dry season generally reduced to a very shallow brook." Indeed, when rain in the mountains, in April and May, melts the snow unusually early, in August and September there is no flowing water whatever. We have here a natural suggestion of the burning up of the river, and consequent distress of its fishes, by the fire of Hephæstus (xxi. 363). On the other hand, Homer must be vindicated from one charge of inconsistency which Dr. Schliemann thinks himself bound to admit respecting the position of the tumulus of Ilium. The position of this as marked on the map would have been on the left of the original course of the Scamander; but it has no claim to be brought into the argument; "the shaft sunk into it gave no proof of its claim to be a sepulchre; it rather appears to have been a mere hill of river sand." Homer, indeed, only refers to the tumulus as at most a low mound with a stèle upon it, from behind which Paris wounds Diomed with an arrow, while still near enough for an interchange of taunts (xi. 372-80). We are thus not called upon to identify it anywhere; but it is of more importance to show that it had a definite position in the scene as conceived by the poet. In two allusions (xxiv. 349, ii. 369-379) it is distinctly placed on the right of the river; and that it is from his position by it there that Hector despatches the luckless Dolon on his night expedition (x. 415) is quite consistent with his having previously held a council of war in the midst of the battle-field beyond the Scamander (viii. 490). The occasions are different, and Dr. Schliemann's difficulty comes from confusing them.

But Prof. Virchow expresses himself as more surprised at the reflection of the general characteristics of the country than even at the proofs of familiarity with the plain of Troy itself:—

"I must say I think it impossible that the Iliad could ever have been composed by a man who had not been in the country of the Iliad... In the Iliad we are struck on the one hand by the truth of the general impression of what is an extensive district, and on the other by the number of distinct views which present to us ever fresh spots of the landscape. I do not refer merely to Homer's oft-noticed characteristic description of all objects by means of short and apt distinctive epithets, as 'Ida rich in springs,' 'the eddying Scamander,' 'the windy Ilium,' but far more to his almost surprising knowledge of the meteorology of the district, of the Flora and Fauna, and the social peculiarities of its population. Three thousand years have not sufficed to produce any noteworthy alteration in these things."

ANY FOR THE HURRY

The Story of Prince Hildebrand and the Princess Ida, by Major T. S. Secombe, with Illustrations by the Author (De La Rue & Co.), contains verses of a romantic and humorous sort, and neat and spirited designs in outline. The book will suit young girls.—Northern Fairy Tales, Illustrated (Samson Low & Co.); The Favorite Album of Fun and Fancy, with Illustrations by E. Griset and Others (Cassell & Co.); Tim Trumble's "Little Mother" (same publishers); Pictures to Paint for Little Folks (same publishers); and The Natural History Series, consisting of eight little gaudily-bound books (Griffith & Farran), all deserve praise. The last contains many spirited little woodcuts by Mr. H. Weir. The 'Album' is much enlivened by numerous designs of a highly amusing and energetic character by M. Griset. These alone should attract all whom they may concern.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons have published

Little Buttercup's Picture Book, which contains numerous woodcuts of cats and dogs, sketches of laughable character, and legendary illustrations of 'Tom Thumb' and the like. Some of these things are pretty, others are silly. The cover is original, and consists of buttercups printed in colour on a blue ground; if it were not for the figure of a boy reading, which is not decorative and is quite out of proportion to the flowers, the design would be an example of good taste. The same publishers send us Rondelet's Singing Quadrilles, with music by M. B. Foster, and Children's Singing Lancers, with music by L. N. Parker, the whole cleverly illustrated by Mrs. Staples, Mr. A. C. Courbould, and Mr. A. D. Longmuir. The music is very cheerful and easy. The cover is stupid. What the Blackbird Said: a Story in Four Chirps, is sent by the same firm. The tale is told with taste, animation, and tact by Mrs. F. Locker, although her narrative is not free from "goodness." There are four illustrations, drawn on wood by Mr. R. Caldecott. As pieces of draughtsmanship they have considerable merit, being careful and solid even to hardness and dryness, and the designs are full of spirit and excellently conceived; the background of the frontispiece, comprising a garden wall with a gate and foliage, could hardly be better than it is. The silhouette of the blackbird in the foreground is capital. These cuts lack "colour." Little Wide Awake Picture Book, by Mrs. S. Barker, has a hideous cover, but it is surpassed in vulgarity by the cover of Prince Darling's Story Book. Both of these books come to us from the above-named firm. The former, with a good deal of pictorial trash, contains a few superior cuts, such as 'Good Resolutions,' p. 159, 'Granny and Baby,' p. 41. There are many pretty little verses which would suit older members of the human race than those who affect picture books. Here are the thoughts, not of children, but of adults about children. The 'Story Book' contains more than three hundred illustrations to four legends translated from the French. Many of the cuts are extremely good. The stories are of the legendary and romantic kind required.

An abominable cover does injustice to Messrs. Cassell's Familiar Friends, by O. Patch, illustrated with numerous capital woodcuts of animals. Of these may be mentioned the truly humorous and pathetic group of dogs, "in a strange home," on p. 115, a touching "study" in the Dogs' Home. 'Nobody's Dog,' on p. 112, is a heartrending picture. The "friends" are all domesticated animals, ranging from cats to guinea pigs.

MIDIANITE AND HITTITE INSCRIPTIONS.

Tristram, Nov. 24, 1880.

CERTAIN accidents and occupations have prevented my noticing at an earlier date two communications to you which possess a peculiar interest. The first is from Prof. W. Robertson Smith (No. 2734, March 20th); and the second, in the next number, is from the Rev. A. H. Sayce. Both treat of inscriptions from Taif, and both determine them to be Egyptian.

I have nothing to say against the theory of Nilotic origin; but I would point out the identity of many characters with those of the inscriptions in 'The Gold Mines of Midian' (pp. 209 to 213). Compare the circle, plain and bisected, simple and ending with one, two, or three tails; the figure called in heraldry a "label," with and without the central leg; the cross and the trident, both of many varieties; the divided parallelogram; the π with detached perpendicular, generally converted to a horizontal; and the stone-hatchet, by which the hieroglyphs denote "Neter" (a god).

I supposed these epigraphs to be Nabathæan. Should other finds confirm the suspicion of their Egyptian origin, they will prove that the old Nile dwellers extended through Midian, north and south, to El-Hijar and to Yemen.

Allow me to offer a short personal explanation. Mr. Hyde Clarke remarks (Journ. Anthropol. Inst., May, 1880, p. 374) upon the Hittite inscriptions that he had at once determined them not to be "cattle-marks, as proposed by Capt. Burton." What I said and repeated in print was ('Unexplored Syria, vol. i. p. 341): "My conviction is that the Hamah inscriptions form a link between picture-writing and alphabetic characters; and I would suggest that the most feasible way of deciphering them would be by comparing them with the wusum (brands) of the several Bedawi families." This is a very different thing: neither my lamented friend C. Tyrwhitt-Drake nor I fancied that mere cattle-marks would be cut in cameo upon the hardest basalt. I added instances of an old and forgotten alphabetic form surviving amongst the Anesh of North-Central Arabia.

In conclusion permit me to congratulate Mr. Dunbar Heath for the admirable acumen which has supplied the "Hittite hieroglyphs" with a syllabary; and to hope that by future studies he will compel scholars to accept his system of transliteration. I would also request him, in case he should republish his 'History of the Hittite Inscriptions' (Pal. Expl. Fund., Oct., 1880), kindly to refresh his memory with a glance at 'Unexplored Syria' (vol. i. pp. 341-42).

RICHARD F. BURTON.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on Saturday last the collection of drawings and pictures formed by the late M. His de la Salle. The following prices were realized for the most important lots:—Drawings.—T. Gericault, Studies for the Race of the Barberi in Rome, 11. 1s.; Study of a Female Figure, in colours; on the reverse, a Nude Male Figure, 7s.; a Soldier on Horseback, probably after Carl Vernet, and Sketch for the 'Chasseur de la Garde,' 13s.; an Oriental with his Horse, and Study of the Picture of 'Diligence,' 6s.; Studies of Groups for the 'Wreck of the Méduse,' 4l. 15s. C. N. T. Charlet, Standard Bearer of the Chasseurs de la Garde, and Study of a Man holding a Child in his Arms, 10s. Decamps, Sketches of Oriental Subjects, and a Carnival Scene, 1l. 10s. N. Poussin, The Nupture of Jupiter, 16l. 10s. F. Goya, A Man playing the Tambourine, 1l. 5s. A. L. Girodet-Trioson, Four Studies of Nude Figures, 5l. 10s. Charlet, Sapeur de la Garde Nationale, 1l. 10s.; Study of an English Peasant, 10s. 6d. Gericault, Studies of Horses for his well-known lithograph, 'Le Maréchal-Ferrant,' 5l.; another Study for the same, 6l.; Study of a Dray Horse, on the reverse Sketches of London Sweepers, 7l.; The Coal Wagon, study for 'Adelphi Wharf,' Sketches on the reverse, 1l. 1s.; Portraits of the Wife and Children of the Shoemaker at whose house Gericault lived when in London, 4l. 10s. Pictures.—R. P. Bonington, A View in the Pyrénées, 52l. 10s.; Gil Blas in the Study of the Archbishop of Toledo, 10l. 10s. N. T. Charlet, A Soldier of the First Republic, 20l. T. Gericault, Horse Race in Rome, 5l. 5s.; Horses and Grooms, a sketch painted during his stay in England, 4l.; Head of Belshazzar, a copy after the painting by David in the Louvre, 2l. 2s.; Head of a Negro, 2l. 2s.; A Lion, a study from the life, 11l. 11s.; A Horse in a Stable, 5l. 5s. T. Rousseau, Landscape, Sunset, 73l. 10s. Rembrandt, Study of a Naked Woman, 200l. Sandro Botticelli, The Holy Family, 357l. Bernardino Luini, The Nativity, 215l. Francesco Mantegna, The Resurrection, 204l. L'Ortolano, The Adoration of the Kings, 106l. A different property—Otto Marcellus, Flowers, Insects, and Reptiles, 11l. 11s. Lubernietzki, The Senses (set of five), 106l.

The His de la Salle collection of Cinquecento and later medallions, plaques, friezes, antique and Renaissance bronzes has just been dispersed under the hammer of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, at prices much beyond the average. We quote the following:—Lionel of Este, with bust of the Duke of Ferrara, by Pisano, 25l. 10s. Lionel of Este, by the same artist, 80l. Lucretia Borgia of Este, Duchess of Urbino, 51l. Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua, 21l. Malatesta Novello, by Pisano, 41l. Malatesta, with female seated, by Matteo di Pasti, 32l. 10s. Malatesta Isotta de Rimini, 40l. Piccinino, commander at Perugia, by Pisano, 81l. Alphonso of Aragon and Sicily, by Hierimio, 31l. Alphonso II. of Aragon, by Guaccolotti, 63l. Victorinus Feltr, by Pisano, 71l. Visconti, by the same, 59l. Alberti, inventor of the camera obscura, by Mazzuchelli, 89l. Mahomet II., by Bertoldo of Florence, 67l. Pius de la Mirandola, by Petreccini, 75l. Boldo, by himself, 40l.; another specimen, with bust to left, 36l. Sforza, fourth Duke of Milan, by Sperandio, 96l. Rario Sforza, Lord of Forlì, 120l. Santucci of Urbino, Bishop, by Guaccolotti, 50l. Sixtus, bust to left, 30l. Savanarola, hand issuing from the clouds, holding a dagger, 26l. Julius II., Cardinal Bishop of Ostia, 36l. Julius II., by Caradosso, 52l. 10s. Innocent VIII., by Pollaiuolo, 30l. Clemens VII., 29l. Pius III., bust to the right, 67l. Bentivoglio, by Sperandio, 125l. Tartagni, by the same, 80l. Carbone, poet, by the same, 159l. Vecchiotti, 130l. Tornabuoni, 80l. Albiza, wife of the preceding, 141l. Sarzanella, by Sperandio, 63l. Salvati, 152l. Cardinal Grimani, 27l. 10s. Magno of Venice, by Pomello, 43l. Stefano Magno of Venice, by the same, 110l. Giovanni Emo, by the same, 45l. Jacoba Correggia, by the same, 36l. Averoldus Altobellus, 81l. Piramini, bust to left, 70l. Astallia Diva Julia, 91l. Aretno's Wife and Daughter, 41l. Cosmo II., 29l. Louis XII., rex, arms of Brittany, 140l. Francis I. of France, in silver, 70l. Henri Quatre and Mary de Medici, 36l. Cardinal Richelieu, by Warin, 31l. 10s. Mommo, Doge of Venice, by Dupré, 31l. 10s. Charles Quint, of German work, 45l. Philip, son of Charles Quint, 30l. Faustina, sen., nearly full-faced, 43l. From among the plaques and bronzes the following may be deemed worthy of note: Madonna and Child, by Moderno, 36l. Judith placing the Head of Holofernes in a Bag, 101l. A frieze, with female on her knees before a saint, 120l.; the companion, 124l. Bacchante assaulting Silenus, 50l. An actor, 47l. The Olympic Zeus, 44l. Venus, semi-nude, 38l. Venus dressing her Hair, 70l. Camillus, the celebrated general, 50l. A Faun, wanting an arm, 111l. Greek Comedian, in sheep's skin, 220l. Athleta, in the act of running, 30l. Statuette of Hermes, 31l. Head of a Mule, with silver eyes, 75l. Hermes, holding up his right hand, 110l. Satyr, with fruit, 42l. Female bust, 46l. Naked man, seated, 40l. Antique head of the Olympian Zeus, 71l. Bust of a Roman soldier, 30l. Female head, 31l. A youth, plucking a thorn out of his foot, 46l.; another specimen, 33l. Laïs emerging from the Bath, 70l. Alcides, with club, 81l. Alcides killing Anteus, 125l. Alcides shooting an Arrow, 44l. Youth seated on a rock, 41l. Semi-nude female seated on a rock, 152l. Roman seated, 66l. Figure of Pomona, 60l. Figure of Flora, 30l. A Faun wrestling, 45l. Dying Gladiator, 37l. Farnesian Faun, 49l. Pomona, finely draped modern statue, 100l. The God Pan, with horns, by Riccio, 154l. Cinquecento bronze statue of a nude female figure diademed, 170l. The sale was numerously attended by English and foreign amateurs, including spirited competitors from France and Germany. The 448 lots produced in the aggregate 9,709l. 3s.

Five-Fit Society.

THE annual elections of officers and distribution of medals to the Students of the Royal Academy will take place on the 10th inst. at Burlington House.

The private views of the Winter Exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours and of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours are appointed for to-day (Saturday); the galleries will be opened to the public on Monday next.

After this week the public will be admitted after noon to the National Gallery on the students' days, Thursdays and Fridays, on payment of sixpence each person, on the plan which has been found valuable at South Kensington. As the practice of closing the Gallery during the month of October has been abandoned, the public will now have much more frequent access to it than formerly. The public is largely indebted to the efforts of Mr. Henry Wallis and a few others who followed him for these concessions.

From circumstances beyond the control of the Council, the Report of the Brading Villa Committee was not laid before the Society of Antiquaries on Thursday evening last.

Mr. E. WALFORD has ceased to be connected with the Antiquary, which he has edited since its commencement.

The French papers announce the death, on the 20th ult., of M. Charles Timbal, which followed a severe surgical operation. Born in Paris in 1822, he studied under Drolling, and made his first appearance in the Salon of 1847. In 1848 he produced 'La Vierge et Madeleine au Calvaire.' This work was followed by 'L'Agonie du Christ aux Oliviers,' 'Résurrection de la Fille de Jaire,' 'La Vierge au Prétoire,' 'Jésus montant au Calvaire,' 'Savonarole,' 'Les Funérailles,' 'L'Eglise Triomphante,' and 'La Présentation de la Sainte Vierge au Temple,' which is in the church of St. Etienne-du-Mont. This painter decorated a chapel in the church of St. Sulpice; he obtained a second class medal in 1848; two rappels in 1857 and 1859; a first-class medal in 1860; the Legion of Honour in 1864. He was fortunate in forming a considerable and very curious collection of ancient works of art, pictures, enamels, ivories, and jewellery, which he sold to M. G. Dreyfus. It is said that he was moved to part with these treasures by the siege of Paris and the fight with the Commune. A second collection was made by him, which is said to be richer than the former one.

A FINE bust of a child in marble, Italian work of the fifteenth century, has been placed in the Salle de Michel Ange, Louvre.

It is reported that the Baron Charles de Rothschild, of Frankfurt, has lately added to his collection a superb cup of silver gilt, a marvellous work of Jannitzer, the price of which, it is said, was 750,000 francs.

DR. HUMANN—he has been made a Doctor for his discoveries—has unearthed at Pergamus a marble statue of Athens, headless, but retaining both its arms. Fragments of the Gigantomachy continue to be found.

MR. ALFRED MARKE, of Long Ditton, the Hon. Sec. of the Society for Photographing Relics of Old London, writes to us:—"Many of your readers will be interested to learn that the famous 'Sir Paul Pinder,' in Bishopsgate Street, will before long be pulled down, the house having, with others, been bought by the Metropolitan Free Hospital as the site of a new hospital. This public-house is the last remaining relic of the splendid mansion built by Sir Paul Pinder at about the end of the reign of Elizabeth and the early years of James I. The ceilings in this and the adjoining houses to the south, pulled down four years ago, were described by the Rev. Thomas Hugo, in his admirable paper on the Ward of Bishopsgate, as 'some of the most glorious ceilings which our country can furnish.' The South Kensington Museum possesses the ceilings removed from the adjoining houses, and I hope may acquire that still remaining in the 'Sir Paul Pinder,' as well as the admirable and thoroughly characteristic external woodwork of what Mr. Hugo called 'by far the finest edifice of the kind in London.' I may add that for the present the house will, I believe, be freely shown to any one interested in antiquities."

It has been officially announced that the pictures to be exhibited in the next Salon shall not exceed 3,000 in number, about a quarter less than the number which swarmed the world this year. M. E. About has shown much good sense in proposing that the best 500 paintings shall be set apart in a single room or rooms. A committee was appointed to consider this merciful proposition. Experience shows that selection is absolutely indispensable and inevitable. The only question is whether a more or less educated committee shall make a selection for the benefit of the public, or each visitor shall pick for himself, the operation of choice being thus performed some hundreds of thousands of times. It would be better for everybody, especially for the painters of bad and indifferent pictures, if public exhibitions were reduced to half their present dimensions, and occurred about half as often.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

MRS. MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—'Maria di Gand.'
CRIVAT PALACE.—Fifth Saturday Concert.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Mr. Cowen's Second Concert.

DIFFICULT as the position of an opera Impresario must of necessity be in many respects, no extraordinary foresight would seem to be required in the selection of novelties likely to have a beneficial influence on the managerial treasury. For years the current of popular opinion has set so strongly against new works based on the conventional lines of Italian opera, that it would appear comparatively easy to avoid mistakes. The successes of the past twenty years, such as 'Faust,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Carmen,' 'Rienzi,' 'Mefistofele,' 'The Taming of the Shrew,' 'Aida,' and perhaps one or two others, have been operas in which increased dramatic interest, orchestral colouring, the abandonment of stereotyped forms, and greater unity between music and drama, are more or less conspicuous. Many masterpieces of modern musicians are still unknown in London, any one of which, it might be confidently predicted, would handsomely repay the cost of production on an adequate scale. Leaving Wagner out of account, the time is surely ripe for one of the works of Hector Berlioz; or, if this be considered overweening ambition, Gounod's 'Polyeucte' and Goetz's 'Francesca di Rimini' are ready to hand, as are also the scores of Boito's talented countrymen, Ponchielli and Franco Faccio. Public taste having indicated with tolerable clearness the course to be pursued, the production of such an opera as Signor Tito Mattei's 'Maria di Gand' at Her Majesty's Theatre would excite surprise were it not that opera managers are sometimes swayed by other considerations than the simple laws of demand and supply. But we have no right to take into account any such considerations, and, viewed either from an art or a commercial standpoint, Mr. Armit's policy is wholly indefensible. 'Maria di Gand' being destined beyond all question to a brief existence only on the stage, it would be a pointless task to devote more space to its description than is necessary as a mere matter of record. The title may be suggestive to some of Mary of Burgundy, who played a prominent part in the troublous history of Ghent; or perhaps of Maria, sister of Charles V. Neither of these, however, is the heroine. The librettist, Signor G. T. Cimino, has taken his ideas from Sardou's play, 'La Patrie,' in which the principal female figure is Donna Dolores. The marital relations of George of Ghent and Mary—the Count Rysoor and Dolores of the original—and the guilty love of the latter for Richard Orley (Karloos van der Noot in Sardou), form the motive of the opera, the oppression of the Flemings by the notorious Duke of Alva being introduced merely for spectacular reasons. The duke himself, a terrible personage in history, is a mere lay figure, and even the principal characters are drawn with such a feeble hand, and speak in such commonplace language, that it is impossible to feel the slightest interest in their movements. In other words, the book is of the old flaccid type, as if nothing had been written and nothing said concerning the necessity for vital improvements in the literary portion of the lyric drama. If the statement be true, however, that the work is already twelve years old, this weakness is to be accounted for to some extent. The opera was tried at St. George's Hall two years ago, and has since then undergone extensive revision and elaboration at the hands of the composer, with the object of rendering it more suited to the tastes of present audiences. But no amount of patch-work will serve to make a work acceptable which is grounded on false principles and written in a worn-out style; nor will it give vitality to music in which freshness of idea is conspicuous by its absence. Remembering that Signor Tito Mattei is the author of some charming songs and agreeable piano pieces, the complete want of individuality in 'Maria di Gand' is surprising. Now it is Donizetti or Rossini, now Verdi, and now Meyerbeer, under whose influence the composer illustrates the subject-matter before him. But for a single phrase, or even a harmonic progression, to strike the ear with the force of novelty, we listen in vain from the first bar to the last. It must be allowed, however, that if the music is wholly without interest, it is also without offence. Signor Tito Mattei does not seek to cloak his poverty of invention by adopting a misty and confused style of utterance, and for thus avoiding the besetting sin of many modern composers he deserves approbation. He writes easily and naturally, apparently quite content to follow humbly in the footsteps of greater men. He expresses strong emotion by the means generally thought to be appropriate in Italian opera, and his melodies would be pleasing if they were not so full of reminiscences. Nothing in the first, second, or fourth acts stands out with sufficient prominence to merit individual comment. In the third act there is a march, based on a bright and tuneful subject, and, with the usual adjuncts of a military band and crowds of supers on the stage, the ensemble of this scene is effective. The finale of the act is undeniably well written, though its pattern is very conventional. With this exception the concerted music is weak, the part writing being of the simplest. Signor Tito Mattei's orchestration is superior to that of Bellini and Donizetti, and approaches nearer to that of Meyerbeer and Gounod. But of the subtle effects to be gained by peculiarities of tone colouring he apparently knows little or nothing; for example, the passages allotted to the corni inglese and the bass clarinet would be equally appropriate if played by any other instrument of similar compass. The performance at Her Majesty's Theatre is worthy of praise. New and effective scenery has been painted, and the ensemble, if not of striking merit, is quite efficient. Madame Zacchi is vocally and dramatically equal to the title rôle, which is not a very important part, the principal solo being excised. Signor Runcio, by far the most capable tenor in the company, gives full effect to the character of the proscribed Richard Orley, and Signor Aldighieri makes the most of the injured husband, George of Ghent. Other parts are satisfactorily filled by Mdlle. Barnadelli, Signor Ordinas, and Signor Bonetti. But when everything that is possible has been said in favour of 'Maria di Gand' and its performance, there remains the question, Why was it produced? It will serve one useful purpose in enabling us to estimate the advance made since the time when operas of this kind were considered the highest form of the lyric drama; and the comparison may afford some ground for a feeling of congratulation, for which Mr. Armit may be thanked. But the pause must not be too prolonged, and it will be to the general advantage if progress is quickly resumed.

M. Saint-Saëns's Concerto for violoncello in a minor, which was performed for the first time at the Crystal Palace concerts last Saturday, is not a work which will add to the reputation of its composer. Like all M. Saint-Saëns's music which we have heard, it is very cleverly constructed, and contains points of considerable interest, but the able French musician in his experiments in new forms often destroys the unity of his work as a whole. His violoncello concerto, which "G." in the analytical programme, correctly describes as being rather a concertino, suffers from an effect of patchiness, in spite of the fact that the theme of the first movement is reintroduced in the finale. The theme itself also is of no great musical value, having a suspicion of dryness about it. The best part of the work is certainly the allegro con moto which takes the place of the usual slow movement; this is graceful and piquant, thoroughly French in style, and charmingly orchestrated. For the rest of the concerto it is impossible to care much. The very showy solo part was played by M. Hollman, solo violoncellist to the King of Holland, who on this occasion made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace. M. Hollman has a remarkably powerful tone, which in a small room would probably sound coarse, but in the large concert-hall at Sydenham was singularly full and sonorous. His intonation is good, and his execution clear and finished. A second novelty at these concerts was a short Adagio for violin and viola soli , accompanied by the basses, from one of Mozart's Divertimenti, recently published for the first time in the complete edition of the composer's works now being issued. The movement is full of its author's characteristic flow of melody, but is not otherwise very remarkable. The solo parts were excellently played by Messrs. Jung and Krause. The orchestra gave very finely Beethoven's Overture to 'Coriolan' and Brahms's Symphony in c minor; Mr. Edward Lloyd was the vocalist, and two ballet airs from Ponchielli's 'Le Due Gemelle' concluded the concert.

The second of Mr. Cowen's four Saturday orchestral concerts, which was given at St. James's Hall on Saturday evening, showed in one respect a marked improvement on the first. As we had occasion to speak of the coldness and want of spirit which then impaired the effect of the orchestral playing, it is a simple act of justice to Mr. Cowen to say that last Saturday's performance left on this score little or nothing to desire. The programme was again most excellent. A really admirable performance of Haydn's Symphony in c (the first of the "Salomon set") opened the concert, the two novelties of which were both from English pens. Mr. W. Shakespeare's Dramatic Overture in d was (we learn from the programme) composed six years ago, and has recently been entirely rewritten. It is a piece of sterling workmanship, containing passages of real beauty—especially the second subject of the allegro—excellently treated, and well scored. It was capitally rendered by the band, though the tone of the violins sounded to us somewhat weak, considering their number. The second novelty was a suite de ballet in six numbers, entitled 'The Language of the Flowers,' by Mr. Cowen. Though not all equal in merit, they are all perfectly clear in form and intelligible, while they are exquisitely instrumented. We consider the first, second, and fifth the most successful; the second especially (a very graceful andante in f) is a little gem. By the way, why has Mr. Cowen employed such a singular sequence of keys as g, f, e flat, c, a minor and major, and e flat? It is true that by connecting one number with its predecessor by a short prelude the harshness of the immediate juxtaposition of unrelated keys is avoided; but a better choice of tonalities might easily have been made. Goetz's Pianoforte Concerto, played a fortnight previously at the Crystal Palace, was a welcome item in the programme. The solo part was fairly well rendered by Madame Frickenhaus, who, however (probably through nervousness), impaired the effect of the first movement by unduly hurrying the time. Weber's Overture to the 'Ruler of the Spirits' concluded the concert. The soloists were Madame Patey and Signor Poli.

NOTES FROM VIENNA.

THE present Vienna opera season promises to be remarkable, among other features, for interesting revivals. Great things are expected of the approaching production of Cherubini's 'Medea,' with Frau Materna—the memorable heroine of the 'Nibelungen' trilogy at the Bayreuth festival, who also made so favourable an impression at the subsequent Wagner Concerts at the Albert Hall—in the title rôle. Weber's 'Preciosa,' and 'Euryanthe' are to follow, and already the ball has been opened by the representation—the first here for some years—of Wagner's 'Meistersinger.' That this opera, a favourite all over Germany, should as yet be known but in fragments to the English public can only be due to the fact that till quite recently no opera had a chance of an adequate rendering in London except on the "Italian" stage. Much as 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' may suffer by such transmutation, the 'Meistersinger' would suffer more. Enchanting goddesses and enchanted knights may adopt what language they please when they visit this earth, but Hans Sachs, the sturdy old Nürnberg cobbler, and his noisy apprentices discoursing in the soft-syllabled language of Petrarch would be an incongruity of the very worst. But it is impossible for an English spectator to witness the excellent performances of the work here under Herr Richter's conductorship without an increased desire that the oft-repeated promises of its production in London may speedily be fulfilled. It would be a revelation to many of Richard Wagner's admirers in our own country of the versatility of his powers, both as dramatist and composer. Now no opera with a bad libretto—Mozart's 'Zauberflöte,' perhaps, alone excepted—has ever achieved a lasting success, and no composer has ever shown himself more alive to the importance of this point than the author of the 'Meistersinger,' an opera both national and original, full of local colour and life, based on a subject of evergreen interest. The scene, picturesque old Nürnberg; the time, the Feast of St. John, 300 years ago; burghers and peasants all in quaint, bright holiday costume. The story is one pre-eminently suited for musical illustration, as a slight outline of it will show. Pogner, a leader among the Nürnberg bards, has a beautiful daughter, Eva, whose hand he has promised to that competitor who shall carry off the palm in the coming contest of the Meistersänger. But her heart is gone to Walther, a youthful stranger who is enamoured of her and boldly aspires to enter the lists and win the prize, though he is unknown in Nürnberg and not yet named "master" by any guild. He appears before the bards in council, and scandalizes them by his claim to be received among them, together with his confession, in the beautiful song "Am stillen Herd," that nature and the great works of great men have been his teachers, and of the technical jargon and preliminary stages insisted on by the school he knows nothing. They consent to give him a hearing, but Beckmesser, a ridiculous old pedant, the butt of the piece, who aspires to win Eva for himself, is appointed umpire. Walther, put on trial, surprises them with a charming "Lenze Lied," which, however, he is hardly allowed to finish. Beckmesser pronounces its unqualified condemnation, and all the masters, Hans Sachs excepted, concur in his verdict. In short, Walther is a genius, and on him is fulfilled the pithy saying of Hans Sachs, "Among the masters, he is worst of who is himself a master born." In the second act, Walther, and the no less indignant Eva, plan to fly together. Hence results a capital scene, in front of the houses of Sachs and of Eva's father, that stand opposite each other. The good old shoemaker, the guardian genius of both lovers, has got wind of the intended elopement, and means to prevent it, persuaded of Walther's eventual triumph over the mastersingers. So he keeps on the alert, and the fugitives, concealed in the bushes, vainly await a favourable moment to escape. Sachs, seated at his door, crouching away, makes the air ring with his song, "Eva aus dem Paradies," of which the words, pointed at Eva, convey a warning that strikes her with compunction. Beckmesser now comes on the scene, posts himself under Eva's window, and wooes her with a serenade. Sachs rallies him unmercifully, and highly comic are the passages between the two. Beckmesser struggles with his serenade—a clever parody of the florid, conventional style, till recently so much in vogue—the wicked Sachs driving him to distraction by ceaselessly hammering at a pair of shoes. The singer flies into a passion at last, a quarrel ensues, the neighbours, eager for a fray, rush on, and in the tumult the lovers hope to slip away unnoticed. But Sachs, still on the watch, intercepts their flight—sends Eva flying back into her father's house, and carries off Walther by force with him into his own.

The third act gives us the triumph of genius over prejudice, envy, and obtuseness. Walther has dreamed a song in a dream; he confides his inspiration to Sachs, who feels confident that this time he can safely defy his detractors. Sachs, whose part was admirably filled on this occasion by Herr Scaria, is a pathetic figure, deeply true to nature, a trusty shoemaker, a mediocre poet, but a sincere lover of the beautiful, and therefore ready to acknowledge and honour the real master singer wherever he meets him. Beckmesser, finding on the table the words of Walther's dream-song, noted down by Sachs, appropriates the poem, believing it to be Sachs's work. Now follows the musical composition. Beckmesser, trying to adapt the words he has stolen to his own ridiculous melody, makes nonsense of the poem, falters, breaks down, and covers himself with disgrace. When he retorts on his derisive audience that the poet is no other than their favourite, Sachs, the latter names Walther as the composer, and calls upon him to sing the song as sung it should be. Walther comes forward, and his beautiful Freilied carries masters and mob before it alike. The mastership, the prize, and Eva are unanimously accorded him, amid general applause.

The opera is one that makes great demands on all concerned in its representation. The performance at Vienna is satisfactory in every respect. The rendering of the choruses especially is calculated to fill the English operagoer with envy. Wagner's masterly treatment of this feature is perhaps nowhere more happily displayed than in this work. The flippant and festive songs of the apprentices, the choruses of the different guilds, the street tumult, the well-known chorale, "Wach auf," Nürnberg's homage to Sachs, so full of beauty in various styles, can but raise regret at the absence of the chorus element from the composer's later, more strictly conceived, lyrical dramas. The precision and firmness of execution of Herr Richter's band are beyond all praise. Among the singers, besides Herr Scaria, mentioned above, Herr Schmitt, in the comic part of David, the shoemaker's apprentice, and Herr Rokitsansky as Pogner, deserve special notice. The Grand Opera at Vienna holds a high place among institutions of the kind—perhaps the highest, taken altogether. With Mesdames Pauline Lucas, Materna, and Bianchi for prime donne, none here can complain that "stars" are wanting, nor yet, seeing that none of the subordinate features is neglected, and the instrumental is never sacrificed to the vocal department, that the "star system" is in vogue. Here, again, nightly performances, on a scale quite equal to that of Covent Garden, and with an even greater variety of programme (in the last twenty-one days twenty-one different operas have been given), are found compatible with a superior standard of execution. It is the custom to stigmatise the Viennese as a most frivolous people, but it must be owned they take their music in earnest. Nowhere, perhaps, even in Germany, does it form so intimate and so prominent a part of social life, and on this and its results I propose to say a few words in a future letter. H. Z.

Musical Society.

The programmes of the Saturday and Monday Popular Concerts consisted entirely of familiar works, and, therefore, need only formal record. On Saturday, Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 59, No. 1; Rubinstein's Sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 18; three of D. Scarlatti's Piano Sonatas, and Beethoven's Romance in G, for violin, were given. On Monday the items were Schubert's Ottet, Haydn's Trio in C, Chopin's Barcarolle for piano, and Molique's Saltarella in A, for violin. Herr Straus was the leader and Mdlle. Janotha the pianist on both occasions. Miss Thorndike was the vocalist on Saturday, and Miss Marian Mackenzie on Monday.

The first of four Trio Concerts, given by Herr Max Laistner (pianoforte), Herr Emil Mahr (violin), and Herr Anton Bouman (violoncello), took place at St. George's Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The programme included Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata for piano and violin; a Violoncello Concerto, by M. S. de Lange; Rubinstein's Trio in A flat, Op. 52, &c. Miss Hilda Wilson was the vocalist. The next concert will take place on Thursday evening, March 10th, 1881.

The accounts of the recent festival at Leeds have been closed, and show even more gratifying results than were anticipated. The attendance was 14,854, an increase of 1,454 over the festival of 1877; and the nett profits 2,371, against 800l.

The programme of Mr. George Riseley's sixth Monday Popular Concert, given at the Colston Hall, last Monday, included Haydn's 'Clock' Symphony, the Overtures to the 'Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage' (Mendelssohn), 'Rosamunde' (Schubert), and 'Die Felsenmühle' (Reissiger), and Gounod's Entr'acte from 'La Colombe' and 'Funeral March of a Marionette.'

Miss EMILY LAWRENCE gave an evening concert, with a very good miscellaneous programme, at the Royal Academy of Music last Tuesday.

At the recent annual meeting of the Edinburgh University Musical Society, the president, Sir Herbert Osakeley, announced the fulfilment of a long cherished wish that each of the Scottish Universities should possess a Students' Musical Society of its own.

The first of a series of Trio Concerts was given at Oak Tree House, Branch Hill, Hampstead, on Tuesday last, when the chief items of the programme were Schubert's Trio in A flat, Beethoven's Trio in A flat, Op. 1, No. 1, Handel's Violin Sonata in A, and a selection from M.S. Suite for piano duet, by Miss Mary G. Carmichael. The remaining concerts of the series are fixed for December 14th, January 11th and 25th.

Mr. JOHN BOOSEY has successfully commenced his fifteenth series of Ballad Concerts at St. James's Hall, two concerts having already been given—on the 26th ult. and the 1st inst. The steady support given by the public to Mr. Boosey is fairly deserved, for, though not appealing to the highest musical tastes, these entertainments are excellent of their kind. A special feature of the present series has been the finished part-singing of the Glee Choir of the South London Association, conducted by Mr. L. C. Venables.

Mr. APROMMAS, the well-known harpist, announces a recital on his instrument, to be given at the Steinway Hall next Tuesday afternoon, on which occasion he will make his first appearance in London after an absence of five years.

M. HENRI REBER, a distinguished French composer and theorist, died in Paris on the 24th ult., at the age of seventy-three. He was a native of Mulhouse, in Alsace, and studied music at the Conservatoire in Paris, where for several years past he had been one of the professors of composition. The list of his works includes five operas, four symphonies, several instrumental quintets, quartets, and trios, besides various songs, pianoforte pieces, &c. He also published a treatise on harmony.

At the special desire of the King of Bavaria, the prelude to Wagner's new music-drama 'Parsifal' was performed by the orchestra of the Munich opera during the composer's recent stay in that city.

M. VICTOR MASSÉ has resigned his Professorship of Composition at the Paris Conservatoire in consequence of ill health, and has been succeeded by M. Ernest Guiraud.

THE WEEK.

HAYMARKET.—Revival of 'The Vicarage' and 'School.'
GAITEY.—Revival of 'The Musical Box,' by F. C. Burnand, and 'Kerry,' by Dion Boucicault.
ADELPHI.—Revival of 'The Green Bushes.'
GAITEY (Matinee).—Revival of 'Andy Blake.' Debut of Miss Sothorn and Mr. Dion G. Boucicault.

THE only novelty, if such it may be called, introduced into the programme with which the Haymarket Theatre has reopened under the Bancroft management, consists in the revival of the domestic comedietta of 'The Vicarage.' This pleasant little piece, adapted by Mr. Clement Scott from 'Le Village' of M. Octave Feuillet, and produced three years ago at the Prince of Wales's, shows at their very best the more prominent members of the Haymarket company. It would be unkind, but would scarcely be unjust, to say that 'School,' which follows, shows them at their worst. In spite of the tender and sympathetic wooing of Mr. Conway and Miss Marion Terry as Lord Beaufof and Bella Farintosh, the performance as a whole is extravagant and farcical.

Extravagance, that great and constant blemish of English acting, is even more apparent at the Gaiety in the performance of Mr. Burnand's play of 'The Musical Box.' When first seen, three years ago, at the same theatre, this piece, which is a version of the delightful comedy of M. Gondinet, 'Le Homard,' received from its principal exponents—the same who now appear—an interpretation which, though preposterous, appears moderate by that now supplied. Neither Mr. Terry nor Mr. Royce seems to be aware how complete a confession of incapacity is made when, in order to produce the laughter which MM. Geoffroy and Gil Perez obtained by perfectly legitimate means, he is compelled to resort to the wildest kind of physical extravagance. Arming himself with a roll of paper, which he uses as a species of stick, Mr. Royce constantly belabours with it the back or the head of his associate. At one time he sits down upon a hat, at another he has a species of duel with Mr. Terry, the weapons being umbrellas. A performance such as that now given at the Gaiety is enough to justify the severest things that French criticism has found to say concerning English acting. In 'Kerry,' a version by Mr. Boucicault of 'La Joie fait Peur' of Madame de Girardin, Mr. Terry as the old servant, a rôle created by Mr. Boucicault, displays some acting of a very different stamp. The kind of humour with which Mr. Boucicault enlivened the character Mr. Terry does not possess. His performance is none the less creditable. Concerning some of those by whom Mr. Terry is supported it is difficult to speak with the equanimity befitting criticism.

In consequence of the disappearance of Mr. Boucicault, the Adelphi has revived the old drama of 'The Green Bushes.' The cast includes some capable actors. So extravagant are, however, the story and incidents of a piece that is yet less than half a century old, that the interest inspired by the porformance is that which attaches to the presentation of a dramatic curiosity.

At a Matinée at the Gaiety Mr. Dion G. Boucicault, a son of the well-known dramatist, appeared as Andy Blake in his father's play of the same name. Mr. Boucicault, jun., showed himself a competent actor, possessing a combination of humour and pathos kindred with that for which his father has long been known. Very little practice will suffice to secure Mr. Boucicault, jun., a prominent position in the art he has adopted. As the heroine of the same piece, Miss Eva Sothorn, a daughter of the well-known comedian, made a modest début. Her performance revealed grace and tenderness.

Dramatic Gossip.

A TRANSLATION, by Mr. W. Archer, of Ibsen's play 'The Pillars of Society,' will, we understand, be produced at the Gaiety Matinées in the course of the present month. As this will be the means of introducing to the English public a prominent and an original poet, we venture to ask of Mr. Hollingshead a cast for the piece worthy of the occasion. Recent Matinées at the Gaiety have been far from satisfactory.

THE Hestia of Athens has lately given some extracts from the translation into modern Greek of Shakespeare's 'Macbeth,' now preparing by Mr. D. Bikelias. The whole play with a translation of 'Hamlet' will soon be published at Athens as a sequel to the first volume of Shakespearean translations by the same eminent littérateur, which appeared some four years ago, containing 'Romeo and Juliet,' 'Othello,' and 'King Lear.' These translations, which are the first of any note ever attempted in the modern Greek idiom, are spoken of very highly.

SATIRES: Political and Social. In Prose and Verse. Edited by W. H. C. NATION.
Bright, witty, and smart, the volumes are highly pleasant reading."

"The follies and vanities of our time are frequently commented upon, and speedily in imaginary conversations in reflections' ruled, for instance, from a street lamp, which is supposed to know a great deal of our private life. The satire is pungent and refreshing, and the tales at which they strike ought to suffer none damage."—Modern Daily Mercury.

From the TIMES.

"The 'Lansdowne Poets,' comprising the works of two dozen or more English poets—not to mention the American Longfellow and Johnson's 'Lives'—several of them very great, and all of them popular, should form a most acceptable present at any time. Brightly bound, legibly printed, with portraits and original illustrations, each volume containing the whole of a poet's works, and all of a price within the reach of everybody's means—the series makes us marvel how there can be purchasers enough to make such an enterprise profitable to the publisher, and yet so little apparent study or appreciation of poetry among the youthful generation of English men and women. At all events, it is not Messrs. Warne's fault."

From the STANDARD.

"The 'Lansdowne Poets.' This series is well printed on good paper, and well bound. We may add that it is also well selected. The volumes before us comprise the works of almost all the popular English poets, as well as Dr. Johnson's critical analysis of those of them who had lived before his time. None but a very epicure in the matter of luxurious books for a library would wish for anything better than this edition of English poets, uniform in everything but the colour of the binding. The illustrations have at least the advantage of coming from good hands. The Lansdowne edition of English poets ought to be popular."

WARNE'S COMPLETE CATALOGUE of STANDARD WORKS, CHOICE GIFT-BOOKS, elegant PRESENTATION WORKS, JUVENILE and PICTURE TOY-BOOKS, in prices from 60s. to 6d., can be had on application, or forwarded post free.

TWO POPULAR NOVELS.

"A remarkable book."—DAILY NEWS.

A STORY OF THE SALT MARSHES.

From the ATHENÆUM:

"Full of indication of more than ordinary talent, and one of the most promising works of fiction that the present season has produced."

From the SCOTSMAN:

"The book is one of the most powerful that has, so far as we know, appeared for many years. It will remind many readers of Emily Brontë's wonderful story, 'Wuthering Heights,' and indeed in some respects it is even more powerful."

From the QUEEN:

"The book is full of smart epigrammatic writing, and has also a good deal of humour. The strange wild poetry of the locality is well brought out, and the characters are well sustained. The book is by no means a commonplace one, and will suggest as well as amuse."

From the DAILY NEWS:

"'Mehalah' is far above the ordinary level of novels. The writer possesses strength, and strength is one of the rarest qualities in modern fiction."

From LIFE:

"A very powerful novel. The whole work is one of the best among this season's crop of fiction."

From JOHN BULL:

"A very powerful and striking novel. Though by no means a mere imitation of Emily Brontë, there is much in it which reminds us of 'Wuthering Heights,' and we are hardly saying too much when we put it on a level with that weird and ghastly story."

THE TRUMPET-MAJOR.

By THOMAS HARDY,

Author of 'Far from the Madding Crowd,' &c.

From the SATURDAY REVIEW:

"Mr. Hardy, in his latest novel, has produced, perhaps, a finer study of character, in a certain sense, than he has before given to his readers. His hero compels admiration and sympathy; and this central figure is surrounded by others, drawn with the truth and insight which has raised Mr. Hardy to the high place he occupies among novelists of our time."

From the ATHENÆUM:

"John Loveday, the trumpet-major, from whom the book takes its title, is the best character that Mr. Hardy has ever drawn. Indeed there are few figures in all fiction more pathetic and, in a quiet way, more heroic than this simple, loyal, and self-sacrificing man."

From the WORLD:

"Specially remarkable for its accurate representation of the events and associations of the time. Excellent in workmanship, and with a well-balanced and skilfully developed plot, it is notable for the character-drawing, which certainly equals, and, we are disposed to think, surpasses, anything that its author has achieved before."

From the JOHN BULL:

"We must pronounce 'The Trumpet-Major' to be one of the best novels of the season, and must cordially congratulate Mr. Hardy on a success which we hope he may repeat, though it will be difficult for him to surpass it."

From the PALL MALL GAZETTE:

"The chief attractions of the book will be found in its descriptions, its scenery, touched with an exquisite truth of details, and its pictures of manners, vivid, and not seldom enriched with delicate shades of satire and humour."

From the COURT CIRCULAR:

"A mere sketch can give no idea of the real beauties of this book. They consist in the fine drawing of character and the singular quaint felicity of Mr. Hardy's style."

From the DAILY NEWS:

"Perhaps Mr. Hardy has never shown more literary and artistic skill than in this story. Humour and pathos, sure and insight and observation are to be found in every page."

From the QUEEN:

"Mr. Hardy has lost none of his powers of description: his art of making the reader familiar with the locality of his story is as remarkable in the present instance as in any of his previous tales."

A HISTORY OF THE FAMILY OF FORTESCUE

IN ALL ITS BRANCHES.

By THOMAS (FORTESCUE) LORD CLERMONT.

With 43 Portraits, Engravings, Monuments, &c.

"The history of the family is traced through all its branches, and everything that could be recovered concerning the lives of the more distinguished Fortescues has been collected and preserved. The labour was no doubt one of love; yet the mere arrangement of materials so extensive, and gathered from so many quarters, cannot but have taken much time and care, and the power of producing from them a narrative so pleasant and so readable is not given to every writer of family history."—Edinburgh Review.

LAWS OF SHORT WHIST, AND A TREATISE ON THE GAME.

By JAMES CLAY.

THOS. DE LA RUE & Co. London.

E P P S ' S C O C O A . GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY LIBRARY.

The Directors do not consider it necessary to add to the following list of newly-published Works, for the sufficient reason that every book which Subscribers can reasonably demand is promptly supplied. This rule of the establishment applies not merely to English publications in the different departments of History, Biography, Travel, Fiction, and General Literature, but also to the extensive and constantly increasing Foreign Library, as well as to the Library of Vocal and Instrumental Music. At the same time, Standard Works of Reference which are never found in Circulating Libraries are daily added to the Reference Library.

The rapidly increasing List of Subscribers is a convincing proof that the public appreciate an institution which gives them, in addition to all the best features of a Circulating Library, the numerous advantages of a High-Class London Club.

With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. 2 vols. 12s. 6d.

OLD ROME: a Handbook of the Ruins of the Ancient

City and the Campagna for the Use of Travellers. By R. SMITH, M.A.

"It is scarcely just however to call it an epitome for the author appears to have rewritten much of the old matter and has also introduced some fresh information. Old Rome, which is simply illustrated, contains everything likely to be of immediate service to the traveller, but the handbook, useful though it be, does not in any degree lessen the importance of the larger work. The use is for the permanent; the other deserves a place in every well-stocked library."

"Former Volumes sing with spirit, speak with good sense."

MRS. EWING'S POPULAR TALES.

"Everything Mrs. Ewing writes is full of talent, and also full of perception and common-sense."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

With a Pictorial Design on the cover, small post 8vo. 4s.

WE and the WORLD: a Story for Boys. With 7 Illustrations by W. L. Jones, Esq.

"A very good book, full of adventure, pleasantly told. The style is just what is needed to be simple, but not bald, full of pleasant humor, and with every touch of feeling. Like all Mrs. Ewing's tales, it is a goodly volume, and well worth reading."—Times.

The same unaccountable aspect, so rare even in men as all but invariably about even in the most modern of women, of getting inside a boy's mind, thinking his thoughts and being then able to put them down on paper so that every one at once recognizes their photographic truthfulness—just as in George Eliot's poems with which Mrs. Ewing has displayed before is crisscrossed."—Saturday Review.

Uniform with the above, Fifth Edition, 4s.

SIX to SIXTEEN: a Story for Girls. With 10 Illustrations by Mrs. A. H. Allingham.

"It is a beautifully told story, full of humor and pathos, and bright sketches of country and city life."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"We have rarely seen of such a modest scale, with characters so shy and simply drawn."—Athenaeum.

"The tone of the book is pleasant and healthy, and singularly free from that sentimental, not to say morbid, which is so common in the larger of these productions. The illustrations by Mrs. A. H. Allingham add a special charm to the volume."—Times.

Uniform with the above, Ninth Edition, 4s.

A FLAT IRON for a FARTHING; or, some Passages in the Life of an Old Maid. With 12 Illustrations by H. Allingham.

"For every parent and guardian who wishes to be amused and at the same time to please a child, 'A Flat Iron for a Farthing' will answer for the delight with which they will read it themselves, and we do not doubt that the young and fortunate recipients will also like it. The story is quiet, original, and altogether delightful."—Athenaeum.

Uniform with the above, with a Pictorial Design on the cover, Third Edition, 4s.

MRS. OVERTHEWAY'S REMEMBRANCES. With 10 Illustrations by Tenniel and Wolf.

"Without exception Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances is the most delightful work we have written for children that we have ever read. There are passages in this book which the genius of George Eliot would be proud to own."—London.

Uniform with the above, Second Edition, 4s.

JAN of the WINDMILL: a Story of the Plain. With 11 Illustrations by Mrs. A. H. Allingham. Also a Larger Edition, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"It is a long time since we have read anything in its way so good. Such a book is like a delightful feast—no want and no wholeness as anything can be. Good as Mrs. Allingham's stories are, even they are but juvenile beside such writing as this."—American Church Union.

Uniform with the above, 4s.

A GREAT EMERGENCY, and other Tales. With 4 Illustrations.

"Never has Mrs. Ewing published a more charming volume of stories, and that is saying a very great deal. From the first to the last the book overflows with the strange knowledge of child-nature which so rarely survives childhood, and moreover with the most delicate and humorous, which is never anything but innocent and well-timed, never vulgar, and never clumsy."—Athenaeum.

The BROWNIES, and other Tales. With 4 Illustrations by George Cruikshank. Tenth Edition. Imperial 12mo. 3s.

"Really charming writing. The frontispiece by the old friend of our childhood, George Cruikshank, is no less pretty than the story."—Saturday Review.

LOB-LIE-BY-THE-FIRE; or, the Luck of Lingborough.

And other Tales. Illustrated by George Cruikshank. Second Edition. Imperial 12mo. 3s.

"Mrs. Ewing has written a good story as her 'Brownies' and that is saying a great deal. Lob-Lie-by-the-Fire has humor and pathos, and teaches what is right without making children think they are reading a sermon."—Saturday Review.

NEW VOLUME BY F. M. PRARD, AUTHOR OF 'THE ROSE GARDEN,' 'CANTOURE,' 'ENNAWAKE,' &c.

MOTHER MOLLY: a Story for Young People. With 11 Illustrations by Charles Green, and a Pictorial Design on the cover. Small post 8vo. 3s.

"This is a pretty picture of a quiet domestic household, not without those excitements which must be found in the life of some families whose fortune it was to live within sight of French ships at the end of the last century."—Athenaeum.

The story is to other Christmas books what Mrs. Blackmore's stories are to ordinary novels. It is fresh, a little quaint, and with a charming story of the latter end of the last century."—Standard.

By the same Author.

THROUGH ROUGH WATERS: a Story for Young

People. With 11 Illustrations, small post 8vo. 3s.

OUR PETS and PLAYFELLOWS in AIR, EARTH, and WATER. By FREDERICK PATMORE. With 4 Illustrations by Northcote, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"Read stories about dogs, and birds, and other domestic creatures, which the writer and her family have delighted to tame and domesticate. This is a pleasant little book, written in good style, and especially to engage the attention of the young in a healthy way. In it Mrs. Patmore's history of household pets is one of the pleasantest."—The Times.

HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE:

READINGS IN NECESSARY KNOWLEDGE FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG WOMEN.

Edited by Rev. J. P. FAUNTHER, P.
Principal of Whitlands College.

Dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G.

"It is a thoroughly efficient and comprehensive manual, and contains more information than half-a-dozen primers of health or social science.
It would be a useful book to add to village lending libraries, or to give as prizes in Sunday schools, or as presents to young servants. It is indeed a pity that this, or some other book of the same sort, is not more commonly in use in so-called ladies' schools and private schoolrooms."

Crown 8vo. with upwards of 100 illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.

LIFE AND HER CHILDREN.

GLIMPSES OF ANIMAL LIFE FROM THE AMOEBA TO THE INSECTS.

By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY.

Author of 'The Fairyland of Science,' 'A Short History of Natural Science,' 'Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students.'

Extract from Preface.

"The main object is to acquaint young people with the structure and habits of the lower forms of life, and to do this in a more systematic way than is usual in ordinary works on Natural History, and more simply than in text-books on Zoology. For this reason I have adopted the title 'Life and Her Children,' so as to express the family bond uniting all living things, as we use the term 'Nature and Her Works,' to embrace all organic and inorganic phenomena, and I have been more careful to sketch in bold outline the leading features of each division than to dwell upon the minute differences by which it is separated into groups. I have made use of British examples in illustration wherever it was possible, and small specimens of most of the marine animals figured may be found upon our coasts at low tide."

By the SAME AUTHOR, uniform in size and price,

THE FAIRYLAND OF SCIENCE.

Eighth Thousand.

Medium 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 25s.

PRE-HISTORIC EUROPE:

A GEOLOGICAL SKETCH.

Of H.M. Geological Survey of Scotland; Author of 'The Great Ice Age.'

Extract from Preface.

"The object of these pages is to give an outline of what appears to be the most considerable physical changes experienced in our Continent since the beginning of the Pleistocene or Quaternary period.
Several general works by some of our most accomplished geologists and archaeologists have already dealt with the subject in part, but none quite cover the ground I have endeavoured to occupy. While some of my predecessors have examined the evidence principally from the point of view of the archaeologist, and others from that of the paleontologist, my aim has been to describe in a more systematic manner than has hitherto been attempted that succession of changes, climatic and geographical, which, taken together, constitute the historical geology of Pleistocene, Post-glacial, and recent times."

Fourth Edition, Revised, embodying the Reports of the Royal Coal Commission, demy 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 16s.

THE COAL-FIELDS OF GREAT BRITAIN:

THEIR HISTORY, STRUCTURE, AND RESOURCES.

With Descriptions of the Coal-Fields of Our Indian and Colonial Empire, and other Parts of the World.

By EDWARD HULL, M.A. F.R.S.

Director of the Geological Survey of Ireland; Author of 'The Physical Geology and Geography of Ireland.'

Extract from Preface.

"This Edition has been largely rewritten. It contains an entirely new chapter on Carboniferous Plants kindly drawn up by Professor William D. B. of Manchester. The Classification of the Carboniferous series of Beds has been modified in accordance with the views enunciated in my paper on the subject read before the Geological Society of London in 1877. The account of the various coal-fields has been modified in accordance with more recent investigations as far as my information extends, and the statistical portions have been brought down to the date of 1875."

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The EDITOR says in his Preface to Vol. XII., just completed,—

"During the six years of its existence, the Staff of THE EXPOSITOR has been doubled; and I have still to announce two most welcome additions to it. R. H. Hutton, Esq. (Editor of the Spectator), one of the first of living Biblical critics, and the Rev. Henry Wace, whose Boyle and Bampton Lectures have placed him in the front rank of the expositors and defenders of the Christian Faith, have both promised early contributions to the New Series."

The NEW SERIES commences in January. Monthly, 1s. post free.

PRÉCIS OF OFFICIAL PAPERS;

BEING ABSTRACTS OF ALL PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS DIRECTED TO BE PRINTED BY BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

SESSION 1880.

"Messrs. Allen have commenced the publication of a most useful work, the need of which has been felt for a long time, though until now no one has had the courage to attempt it. The prices are very well done." Journal of the Statistical Society, June, 1880.

"There is no doubt as to the value of most parliamentary publications, but few persons have the time or inclination to wade through them, and thus much valuable matter is missed, but in this Précis Messrs. Allen & Co. give an outline of just what is required." Iron Trade Review.

"Messrs. Allen & Co.'s book is composed of abstracts of all returns directed to be printed by either or both of the Houses of Parliament, and the work has evidently been done by practical précis writers who understand how to reach the important features of Government papers." Liverpool Daily Courier.

"This is a publication which supplies a great want. We gladly welcome this work, both for reading and for reference." United Service Gazette.

"The papers are carefully condensed." British Mail.

"In the case of statistical returns it is especially good." Cambridge Chronicle.

"This is not a Blue-Book, but none of them can exceed it in value. Every business man will have it up on the desk corner for reference, and it should be found on the table of every public reading-room and private library." Western Times.

"A most useful work of reference." Railway News.

"This is a very important work, and its personal will place readers on a far higher intellectual level and acquaintance with the parliamentary papers than most ordinary members of Parliament possess." Finance Chronicle and Insurance Circular.

"This serial is calculated to be of much service." Iron.

"The above contains a vast amount of valuable information and statistics." Sunday Times.

"We sorely need and that it is a valuable work." Harper's Railway Journal.

"As a book of reference, promises to be of incalculable value to public men, journalists, economists, historical students, and, indeed, all who are interested in national progress and contemporary politics." Statist.

"The difficult work of summarizing is extremely well executed. Both paper and type are good." Broad Arrow.

"An excellent publication." Farmer.

"Messrs. Allen & Co. earn the gratitude of all who require to keep themselves acquainted with the contents of parliamentary papers by the publication of this précis. The compilation has been made with discretion, and will be found extremely valuable and useful for reference." Dundee Advertiser.

"As a handy work of reference, and a means of saving time and labour, it will be highly appreciated." Allen's Evening Mail.

"The utility of the précis is very considerably heightened by an admirable table of contents numerically and alphabetically arranged." Railway News and Joint-Stock Journal.

"The précis of official papers will give new value to the parliamentary returns." Liverpool Courier.

"Nunc cunctos recondere servare in publico et a conspectu non confectis qui non se committunt nec in seculum signantur certe publicatio nova." Revue des Intérêts Matériels, Bruxelles.

LITERATURE

The Life of Sir Rowland Hill, K.C.B., and the History of Penny Postage. By Sir Rowland Hill and his Nephew, George Birkbeck Hill, D.C.L. 2 vols. (De La Rue & Co.)

THERE is no living Englishman, scarcely indeed an inhabitant of any civilized state, who does not owe a debt of gratitude to Sir Rowland Hill. His discovery—for it was a discovery in the best sense of the word—of the penny post has brought untold blessings to the world. The poorest cottage has been made happier by it. It has augmented the revenue of nations. It has tended to diffuse learning throughout the land. It has helped to keep alive the home ties and the home affections. Since the discovery of the art of printing, probably no one agency has done so much social, moral, and intellectual good. We are already so used to the benefits which the penny post affords that it is difficult to recall, or at least to realize, the time when letters by post were comparatively rare and infrequent, and when their cost was so great that the rich man looked upon them as a luxury, while the poor man was often altogether unable to receive them.

It is right, then, on every ground that Sir Rowland Hill should be held in honour and remembrance. It is only fitting that statues should be erected to his memory, and that he himself should lie among the great and good who consecrate Westminster Abbey with their dust. It is well, too, that a record of his life and life-struggles in pursuance of his one great aim should be laid before those whom he has so largely served.

The more such a record is circulated and read the better. It is the history of a brave and single-hearted man, absorbed by one idea, often discouraged, but never despairing, working on, with but little aid or sympathy, till at last he had achieved his work. Recognition came late in life to him, but as long as the penny post was successfully established he cared little about himself. It was a comparatively small matter what became of him if only his great thought should take root and flourish. So his life remains a monument of patient, hopeful labour and of unselfish aims.

But the book before us cannot possibly do what we should have wished it to do.

These huge, ponderous volumes, how widely will they be circulated and read? They are to the readable books of to-day what the bulky and costly epistles of the past are to the letters of the penny post. Sir Rowland Hill was an excellent man and a great benefactor, and we would gladly recall his memory; but a book like this appears to crush it. Most people were dismayed by the size of Matthew Davenport Hill's biography, but that was nothing to this memoir of his brother. When will biographers remember that "the half is better than the whole," and that books are successful in proportion as they are read with interest, and not as they are merely weighed and measured? And this work is unfortunately heavy in other than a physical sense. Though there are interesting passages in it, there is much that is trivial and much that is dull; and very few and very weary will be those who read steadily through to the end of the last appendix. Apart from the noble life itself there is little to excite curiosity. There are hardly any stories worth repeating, or estimates of character worth remembering. The book shows no want of care, but a terrible want of judgment. In one word, it will repel instead of attracting readers, and we are heartily sorry that it should be so.

The work is divided into three parts. In the first Dr. Birkbeck Hill relates his uncle's early life, and in doing so quotes largely from a "Prefatory Memoir" which Rowland Hill himself wrote. Then follows Rowland Hill's own account of 'The History of Penny Postage'; and then the editor again takes up the thread of the story. Lastly, there are long appendices, some of which, being much less readable than the ordinary contents of a Blue-Book, might really have been spared us.

The first thirty pages of the book are taken up with an account of the grandfathers, grandmothers, and other progenitors of the Hill family. They seem to have been extremely worthy people, and the history of their sayings and doings might have been conveniently printed for the use of their own relatives. Others, who are not fortunate enough to have been related to them, will probably think the narrative might have been shortened. However, at p. 34 Rowland Hill is born, and the life may be said to begin at last. Rowland Hill's father was a Birmingham man, and, being a champion of Priestley's, managed to get his arm injured in the disgraceful Church and King riots, in which Priestley's house was burned down. He married and removed to Kidderminster, where Rowland Hill (the third son) was born. The family then moved to Wolverhampton; they were exceedingly poor, and were glad to take an old farmhouse, which they got cheap as it had the reputation of being haunted. However, they do not seem to have been disturbed by ghosts, and little Rowland was happy enough, playing with a little girl who, twenty-five years afterwards, was to be his wife, and making models of water-wheels and other mechanical contrivances. When Rowland Hill was seven years old his father left Wolverhampton, and went to the outskirts of Birmingham, where he opened a school, in succession to Mr. Thomas Clark, who had been an early friend of his. The terms were certainly moderate enough, for boarders only paid from twenty to five-and-twenty guineas. Here Rowland Hill was educated, and here was to be his home for the next sixteen years. He was a delicate boy, but full of ingenious plans, and always most trustworthy and most anxious to be of use. The first book he ever bought was Miss Edgeworth's 'Parent's Assistant,' and he used in after life to say that nothing helped to form his character so much as her stories.

"He said, and the tears came into his eyes as he spoke, that he had resolved in those early days to be like the characters in her stories, and to do something for the world."

Another reminiscence is interesting on different grounds:—

"I early saw," said Rowland, "the terrible inconvenience of being poor. My mother used to talk to me more than to all the others together of our difficulties, and they were very grievous. She used to burst into tears as she talked about them. One day she told me that she had not a shilling in the house, and she was afraid lest the postman might bring a letter while she had no money to pay the postage."

A few years passed, and Rowland Hill was at work with his brother Matthew, teaching boys at a neighbouring school, and soon afterwards the two brothers took their father's school into their own hands. Rowland's powers were now rapidly developing, and he had attained remarkable proficiency in mathematics, and especially in mental arithmetic. He was also ambitious as regards the school, and had many schemes, some sensible enough and some very fanciful, in reference to the management of boys. The brothers published a book on 'Public Education' which made some little sensation, and their school, which was now established at Hazlewood, near Birmingham, became famous. Educationalists and philanthropists were frequent visitors, and with this new fame grew up new duties and responsibilities, under which Rowland Hill's health began to suffer. The site of his school was again removed to Bruce Castle, Tottenham, and here Rowland Hill (married to the little girl who had been his playfellow years before) remained till he finally gave up school-keeping, and undertook the task which was to earn for him a lasting reputation. And here ends the first part of this biography, which is quite too long, though there are passages here and there—such as the visit to Edgeworthstown—that are worth reading. The extracts about other tours he made are for the most part simply irritating; who wants to know that and a great deal more equally puerile?

The most characteristic thing about Rowland Hill's early life was the way in which he and his brothers always worked together. The family affection was singularly strong, and no strain was great enough to break it. For many years they had all their property in common, and lived, as the editor tells us, like "the early Christians." After the division of property, which came later on, the brothers established a sort of mutual in-insurance, which they called "The Family Fund," and which was to assist any one of them "if in circumstances much depressed as compared with the others, though not in absolute poverty." A family united by bonds like these was tolerably sure to get on in the world.

But we must now take up the thread of Rowland Hill's life, as he gives it himself in the second part of this book, 'The History of Penny Postage.' This is an important and valuable statement of the facts which induced Rowland Hill to take the subject up, of the difficulties he encountered, and of his final success. No detail is omitted; letters and documents are given in full. It is singularly businesslike and painstaking. On the other hand, it is very lengthy, though the editor tells us he has made considerable omissions, and has gathered the less important parts into appendices.

It is, no doubt, difficult to know what more Dr. Birkbeck Hill could have done, though perhaps a wiser discretion might have led him to complete the biography himself in a single volume, and afterwards publish 'The History of Penny Postage' as a separate work. As it is, the biography seems to be overweighed by the history, which, while it adds to the value, will necessarily take from the popularity, of the book.

For some time after leaving his school Rowland Hill was secretary to the South Australian Colonization Commissioners, and, as usual, performed his duties with zeal and energy. He also began to take up the great question of postal reform. How much postal reform was needed it is unnecessary to say. We are, however, here reminded that "if, when residing at Birmingham, we received a letter from London, the lowest charge was ninepence, while the slightest enclosure raised it to eighteenpence, and a second enclosure to two shillings and threepence, though the whole mass might not weigh a quarter of an ounce." And the natural result of these almost prohibitory rates was that every opportunity was seized to circumvent the Post Office. Most people know Coleridge's anecdote about the cottager at Keswick, and Rowland Hill tells an equally curious story of the way in which he himself managed to convey news and evade the postage:—

"In the year 1823, taking a holiday excursion through the Lake district to Scotland, and wishing to keep my family informed as to my movements and my health (then in a depressed state), I carried with me a number of old newspapers, and in franking these, according to the useless form then required, while I left the post-mark with its date to show the place, I indicated my state of health by selecting names according to previous arrangement; the more Liberal members being taken to indicate that I was better, while Tories were to show that I was falling back; 'Sir Francis Burdett' was to imply vigorous health, while probably 'Lord Eldon' would almost have brought one of my brothers after me in anxiety and alarm."

It was certainly time to have a reform, and Rowland Hill set to work, never letting the subject drop till he had achieved his end.

In the January of 1837 he first laid his plan before the Government, and Mr. Charles Villiers, writing many years afterwards, recalls

"the great disinterestedness that he showed when he requested me to submit the scheme, then in M.S., to the Government, offering to allow them to have the entire credit of its introduction, if they chose to undertake it, stipulating only that if they should refuse he should then refer it to the press, and make it known to, and understood by, the country."

A commission reported, partially at least, in favour of the plan, but the Government did nothing; so Rowland Hill had to publish his pamphlet and appeal to the public at large.

Much pressure was necessary before any way could be made. The existing Post Office authorities were anxious to show "how not to do it," and behaved as a well-regulated Circumlocution Office was certain to behave. Finally, in the July of 1839, the new Postage Bill, which the Government had at last taken up, passed through the Commons in spite of the opposition of Sir Robert Peel, and in a few more days Lord Melbourne had introduced it into the House of Lords. It was now safe, and on the 17th of August it had received the royal assent.

Rowland Hill was now required by Government to carry out his own plan, and after some negotiation he was attached to the Treasury, with full powers as regards the Post Office and at a salary of 1,500*l.* a year for two years. Nor was this all. Presents, testimonials, and grateful letters came in to him, and he was happy in being in a position to show his recognition of them by constantly improving the machinery and simplifying the details of this great national reform. But before his work was completed the Tories came into power, and at the end of his third year of service (an additional year had been given to him by Mr. Baring) he was dismissed from his charge. He had never got over the jealousy of the Post Office authorities, and they had great influence with both Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Goulburn. Though now no longer able to superintend the working of his plan, Rowland Hill was not a man to give up anything in despair. He was tenax propositi; if ever man was, and he simply waited, making himself useful as Chairman of the Brighton Railway. And if the Government proved itself ungrateful, the people of England did not. A national testimonial was started at the instance of Mr. Estlin, an eminent surgeon at Bristol, and before long the subscription had reached the sum of 13,000*l.*

In 1846 there was again a change of ministry, and Rowland Hill was reappointed, but with a slightly reduced salary, and under the name of Secretary to the Postmaster. Even now, of course, there was to be no plain sailing—there were the old troubles, the old opposition; but the work went on, and in the year 1854 he was appointed sole secretary. We need not follow his career in further detail. In 1860 he was made by Lord Palmerston a Knight Commander of the Bath, and four years later he received a grant of 20,000*l.*, also at Lord Palmerston's recommendation. This was practically the end. His health was sadly broken, and his life's work was done. He lived on many years yet, and his biographer winds up his story with some account of what he did, but there is not much more to tell. Death came at last, a happy release to the worn-out man. He died on the 27th of August, 1879, and a few days afterwards was laid to rest in Westminster Abbey.

The Bacchæ of Euripides. With Critical and Explanatory Notes, and with numerous Illustrations from Works of Ancient Art. By John Edwin Sandys. (Cambridge University Press.)

THE 'Bacchæ' has received, perhaps, more than its fair share of attention from editors; yet such is the fascination exercised by its weird motive over all who enter the sphere of its influence, that there is still plenty of room for Mr. Sandys's most admirable work. The play has always been popular, partly owing to the deep interest attaching to the subject of Bacchic enthusiasm, and again in Christian times owing to the points of similarity in situation with the infinitely deeper tragedy of which the Christus patiens was the hero, in conjunction with the striking contrast of conduct presented by the pagan and Christian ideals of "outraged and patient deity." The terrible revenge taken by Dionysus on his opponents is revolting to modern feeling, but, in other respects, the character of the wine god and his votaries as delineated by the poet is of a high standard, being singularly free from anything licentious or grotesque. Throughout all the fanatical excitement runs a tone of elevated moral sentiment utterly at variance with ordinary notions of the jolly god and his crew. The wine lauded by the chorus might be "zoedone," for any suggestion there is of its intoxicating effects. A few slight verbal alterations and the play might be performed by Good Templars, with Sir Wilfrid Lawson as Coryphæus. The Mænads' frenzy is not vinous, but religious. Their deity, for all his wine-flushed face, is the Dionysus of the Mysteries, not of the vintage. No doubt Mr. Sandys has some reason for arriving at the conclusion that Euripides shows in this play that "his earlier sceptical temper with its 'obstinate questionings' had, like a troubled stream, run itself clearer with the lapse of time; and that, toward the close of life, the 'years that bring the philosophic mind' had led him at last to a calmer wisdom." Yet we do not feel certain that the poet is not still holding up to derision the persecuting tendencies of orthodoxy by throwing into contrast the placid adoration of "Sanctity," Ὁσία, with the fiendishness of the deity's revenge for a very natural instance of unbelief. In any case, the Cambridge Public Orator's essay on "The Purpose of the Play" is a most valuable contribution to the literature of the subject. The same may be said of the section on the legend of Pentheus in earlier literature, as well as of those on the "Outline of the Play," on the dramatis personæ, &c., on "The After Fame of the Play," on "Euripides in Macedonia," and on "Textual Criticism," not to mention a useful synopsis of pertinent editions and dissertations. There is a full apparatus criticus in foot-notes, and a copious commentary placed after the excellently printed text.

The volume is interspersed with well-executed woodcuts, and its general attractiveness of form reflects great credit on the University Press. In the notes Mr. Sandys has more than sustained his well-earned reputation as a careful and learned editor, and shows considerable advance in freedom and lightness of style. Among the ample explanations and illustrations of the actual play there are sundry very useful adversaria on points of general scholarship; e.g., on l. 1132 we have several parallels to the construction ἦν δὲ πᾶς ὁμοῦ βοή, ὁ μὲν στενάδων . . . αἱ δ' ἡλάλασαν, "the implied subject split into its component parts, and each of those parts placed in the nom. in opposition to that implied subject" (though Soph., 'Ant.' 260, φίλας ἐλέγχων φύλακα, presents a variation from the two nominatives); on l. 455, οὐ . . . πάλης ἔρε, are several good instances of οὐ to be taken closely with a substantive; and on l. 1288, τὸ μᾶλλον καρδία πύρην ἔχει, we have a collection of similar objects to a phrase which has a transitive sense. One of Mr. Sandys's best suggestions for the improvement of the text is on l. 1002, where the MS. gives γνῶμαν σῶφρον θάνατος ἀποφάσις εἰς τὰ θεῶν ἐφύ βροταίῃ τ' ἔχεν ἄλιος βίος. Mr. Sandys joins Heath's σῶφρον ἂν θνατοῖς with Elmsley's βροταίῃ for βροταίῃ, proposes ἀποφάσις, and renders the passage, "Life becomes painless if we keep a temper befitting mortals, a temper which belongs to mortal men who are prompt in their obedience to things divine." The citation of Elmsley's reference to 'Alc.' 802, ὅττις δὲ θνητοῖς, θνητὰ καὶ φρονεῖν χρεών, does not help us much as to βροταίῃ γνῶμαν, for Hercules clearly means, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Cf. rather εἰς οὐχ ὑπέρβην θνητὸν ὅττι χρὴ φρονεῖν, 'Æsch., 'Pers.' 820; οὐ γὰρ ἴσθ' ὥστε τὰ θεῶν βουλεύματα ἱερυνδοῦν βροταίῃ φρονί. θνατοῖς δ' ἀπὸ ματρὸς ἐφύ, Pindar, 'Frag.' (33), Donaldson. We doubt the soundness of the suggestion on l. 2, ὅν τινατε ποτὶ . . . Σαμίλη λαχυνθίῳσιν, that "the aorist λαχυνθίῳσιν, as well as the participle ποτὶ, indicates the past time," &c. Now, even if the verb were in the future, so momentary an action as delivery by a flash of lightning, if expressed by a participle, would naturally be by the aorist participle. We venture to suggest an alternative interpretation of l. 326, κοῦτε φαρμάκους ἀπὸ λάβοις ἐν, οὐτ' ἀνεν τοῦτων νοσοῖς. Mr. Sandys and others take τοῦτων to refer to φαρμάκων, and our editor suggests the correction ἀνιέντες; we take τοῦτων to refer to the Thebans generally, "nor does thy disease fail to affect the state." Is it not probable that in l. 278 ἡλθεν ἐνὶ is a correction of —η μὲν ἐν from the line above, which had ousted the right word or words? It seems all but certain that ll. 200–203 are out of place, and they should perhaps be put after l. 271. Cadmus's worship of his own grandson has nothing to do with πατρίους παραδοχὰς αἱ δ' οὐκ ἔχουσιν χρόνον πενήμησθ', nor was the belief in Dionysus "received" at Thebes, hence the long note on l. 200, εὐδὲν συφιδύμεσθα τοῖσι δαίμοσι, rendered "We don't philosophize (do not rationalize) about the gods," loses some of its point. These four verses are quite appropriate in Teiresias's speech to Pentheus, and lead up well to οὐτος δ' ὁ δαίμων ὁ νέος, κ.τ.λ. The proposed transfer enables us to give a legitimate construction to l. 200, "Our shrewdness is nought in the regard of the deities." It is a pity that the good note on l. 385 should be disfigured by the misprint τελευταθῆναι for τελευταθῆναι in Heracitus's well-known maxim. The fragments of English translation scattered through the notes are generally elegant, but their extraction from a metrical version is a detriment to some. For instance, on l. 386 prose would be preferable to

Unbridled lips and lawless folly
Can only end in hapless doom.
But the gentle life and wisdom's ways
Endure unshaken and bold fast the home.

We are compelled by our limits to pass by many points which we should like to discuss, e.g. the relation of the subjects of paintings on Greek vases to the drama (p. cvii), and the question whether Euripides had ever been an artist (p. xcvi), not to mention sundry items of textual criticism.

From a dilettante point of view the woodcuts are interesting, and scholars will find some of good service in illustrating particular points, e.g. the effeminate Dionysus, p. 26, the horned Dionysus, p. 55, and the bas-relief of the death of Pentheus, p. xciii; but archaeologists will probably feel that the selection is not entirely happy. One cut, that on p. 7, may be seen in Smith's 'Classical Dictionary,' another in Smith's 'Dictionary of Antiquities' (see p. lix). One or two others, e.g. the terra-cotta lamp (p. 238), are not worthy of their position. The Capitoline head of Dionysus (p. 25) is wrongly described as horned, though it is omitted from the list of horned Dionysai given p. cxxiii. The representation of the death of Semele, p. 1, gives occasion for the following obviously misleading remarks:—

"The god is represented with wings, that most natural expression of the idea of omnipresence with which all archaic art, whether Greek or Etruscan, following its Assyrian models, Phry's 'Asiatic School,' loved to equip every divinity."

That Mr. Sandys should betray comparative unfamiliarity with archaeological lore will not be surprising to those who know the abundant evidence of his devotion to pure scholarship. With regard to this department, in which our editor is so thoroughly at home and turns out such first-rate work, it ought to be noticed that, in addition to the judicious display of his own rich stores of erudition, Mr. Sandys sets before us many valuable adversaria by the late Mr. Shilleto, the Master of Trinity College, and Mr. J. S. Reid. Under such circumstances it is superfluous to say that for the purposes of teachers and advanced students this handsome edition far surpasses all its predecessors. The volume will add to the already wide popularity of a unique drama, and must be reckoned among the most important classical publications of the year.

Duty. By Samuel Smiles, LL.D. (Murray.)

EARNESTNESS and high moral purpose have gained for Dr. Smiles's writings a popularity which has been denied to works of greater literary power. The same valuable qualities which earned for 'Self-Help' its extensive circulation are conspicuous in 'Duty,' and, like the former book, it presents an anecdotal commentary on the virtues which it inculcates. Its central idea is that obedience to duty is the essence of the highest life, and all periods of history furnish illustrations of the maxim. The store of anecdote which Dr. Smiles has at his command is abundant, and, though few of the stories are new, they are almost all pointedly told. Examples of the noble lives of men and women who at various times have immortalized their names by devotion to duty may well excite a glow of enthusiasm, and cannot but exercise a wholesome influence. From this point of view 'Duty' may be cordially recommended.

But the good intentions and merits of the book do not wholly condone its faults. The reader will find, even from a hasty perusal of its pages, that the anecdotes are sometimes told in a misleading, if not inaccurate, manner, and that occasionally truth is sacrificed to point. Thus, on p. 75, the charge of venality against Demosthenes is sustained by the familiar story of Harpalus. But when Prof. Jebb states that the accusation against the Athenian orator is beyond all reasonable doubt untrue, the alander should not be perpetuated among anecdotes of undoubted authenticity. Dr. Scott's negotiations with Goldsmith and the refusal of the latter to become, as Dr. Smiles phrases it, "the hackwriter of political prostitutes," are cited to prove that "poor and noble" Goldsmith could not be bought (p. 81). To heighten the effect of his magnanimous refusal, the depth of his poverty is illustrated by Johnson's sale of the MS. of 'The Vicar of Wakefield' to release him from arrest. The date of Scott's visit, which was really made in 1767, is thus fixed: "In the time of Lord North, Junius was in opposition. It was resolved to hire Goldsmith to baffle his terrible sarcasm." The passage quoted leaves the impression, in both cases false, that in 1767 Lord North was at the head of the Government and Junius his formidable antagonist. Finally, in 1767, three years after the sale of 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' Goldsmith was earning about 800*l.* a year in the present value of money. Historians have discerned as much self-interested prudence as generous self-denial in Pitt's appointment of Barré to the clerkship of the Pells (Dr. Smiles calls the office the clerkship of the Rolls), but at any rate it gives a false colour to the facts to style the recipient "a poor, blind friend" (p. 82). Barré was then neither "poor" nor "blind," for he enjoyed his eyesight and a pension of over 3,000*l.* a year. It is stated on p. 194 that Dante's gallantry at the battle of Campaldino was one of the reasons which caused his banishment from Florence, and that Chaucer served under Edward III. in France in 1379. The first is surely a misleading statement, and the second a palpable error. The contrast between the obscurity of Cervantes during his lifetime and his posthumous glory is sufficiently strong without stating (p. 197) that it is not known where he was born, and that several towns, among which the successful claimant is not mentioned, still contend for the honour of his birthplace. For the last 120 years Alcalá de Henares has been recognized without dispute as the place of his birth, and the statement can only have been introduced to render the contrast more effective. These instances sufficiently illustrate our meaning, though they might probably be multiplied by careful study of the book. There are also several minor inaccuracies, in themselves slight, but collectively not unimportant. Socrates (p. 16) died in his seventieth not his seventy-second year; Dion (p. 17) was the brother-in-law, not the brother, of Dionysius the elder. It is difficult to recognize in the French disguise of Louis de Saint Angel (p. 113) the receiver of ecclesiastical revenues in Aragon, Luis de Santangel. The name of Columbus's second son could never have been Fernand (p. 115), and Alonso de Villego should not be called de Villego (p. 115). The Duc de Mayenne (p. 191) appears on p. 103 as the Duke de Maienne. Jeanne Darc may without objection be styled Joan of Arc (p. 125), but she should not on the next page be called Joan d'Arc; her birthplace was Domremy, not Domrémy; and Descartes was not quartered at Neuburg on the Danube, but at Neuburg.

Lastly, there are a number of errors of which probably Dr. Smiles's recent illness is the cause, and a few may be noted for correction in the next edition. They commence with "Pulleney's guineas" in the table of contents. The victory of Henry of Navarre appears as Argues, not Arques; the massacre of Vassy as Voissey; Deira as Deira; Marmont as Marmot; Almeida as Almedia; the Simple Discours of Courier as the Simple Discours; and Fray José Indio, who wrote the inscription on the fly-leaf of the 'Lusiad,' as Judis.

Across Patagonia. By Lady Florence Dixie. (Bentley & Son.)

SEVERAL English and many Spanish women have crossed the Andes at different points. Some have ascended the Magdalena to the Meta, descending to the Orinoco, and passing through the dangerous wilds of El Rio Negro; others have gone up the Guayaquil, and over the escarpment of Chimborazo. More than one English woman has ridden to Cusco, and charmed the hearts of hundreds of swarthy children on the way by the sweetness of her looks, and what appeared to these simple, believing people, the heavenly beauty of her manners; and not a few, in the long course of the last three centuries, have scaled the wondrous peaks which look down upon the mightiest rivers that roll beneath the sun; but not one of them has written so well as Lady Florence Dixie. Catalina de Arauco encountered the terrible perils of the Andes, suffered hunger and thirst, and did more heroic deeds than Lady Florence Dixie; but she wrote with singular plainness of speech, and killed men—purely in self-defence—rather than birds and huanacos, as she more correctly spells the name of that fleet and beautiful creature. There is this in common between Catalina and Lady Florence Dixie: that they both dressed like men, rode horses, explored the Andes, were equally courageous, and that each has given an account of her travels; and although it may be true, as Lady Florence supposes, that she and her companions "were the first who ever burst on to that silent sea" which lies at the foot of the three red peaks called "Cleopatra Needles," yet she should not be so sure of that. Greenwood, the hermit, who still wanders about there, might have had the same conviction; and so might the lady of Arauco. The fond conceit had therefore been better kept for private boasting.

There is no scenery in the world that can be likened to that of Patagonia, and Lady

Florence Dixie describes it like one who feels sympathy with and thoroughly enjoys Nature, and is at the same time an accurate observer. The following is a fair specimen of her powers:—

"Of a totally different aspect was this new country on which we were entering from that we had just quitted, for the woods closed in on all sides, and huge masses of rocks rose from out their leafy tops, giving the appearance of ruined strongholds to those who beheld them for the first time. Sunny glades, carpeted by rich green grass, opened out here and there, as though they had been cleared and fashioned by the hand of man, while a lovely little stream, which made its appearance from out of the woods on our right, continued its course towards a deep ravine, which we could distinguish in the distance. Away to our left, and surrounded by thick woods, glittered the clear sparkling waters of an immense lake, which we judged to be about two miles distant, and beyond all rose up like a huge frowning barrier, the lofty snow-capped peaks of the Cordillera. Not a sound disturbed the deathlike stillness which reigned over everything; no animal life was stirring, and the impression conveyed to an eye-witness who beheld this scene for the first time was a sense of utter loneliness and desolation."

Her descriptions of ostrich hunts are excellent:—

"'Choo! choo! Plata!' I cry to the dog who followed at my horse's heels, as a fine male ostrich scudded away towards the hills we had just left with the speed of lightning. But the ostrich suddenly doubles to the left, and commences a hurried descent. The cause is soon explained, for in the direction towards which he has been making a great cloud of smoke rises menacingly in his path, and, balked of the refuge he had hoped to find amidst the hills, the great bird is forced to alter his course, and make swiftly for the plains below. But swiftly as he flies along, so does Plata, who finds a down-hill race much more suited to his splendid shoulders and rare stride. Foot by foot he lessens the distance that separates him from his prey, and gets nearer and nearer to the fast sinking, fast tiring bird. Away we go, helter-skelter down the hill. Plata is alongside the ostrich, and gathers himself for a spring at the bird's throat. 'He has him, he has him!' I shout to Gregorio, who does not reply, but urges his horse on with whip and spur. 'Has he got him, though?' Yes—no—the ostrich with a rapid twist has shot some thirty yards ahead of his enemy, and whirling round, makes for the hills once more. And now begins the struggle for victory. The ostrich has decidedly the best of it, for Plata, though he struggles gamely, does not like the uphill work, and at every stride loses ground. 'Can he stay?' I cry to Gregorio, who makes and nods his head. He is right, the dog can stay, for hardly have the words left my lips when, with a tremendous effort, he puts on a spurt, and races up alongside the ostrich. Once more the bird points for the plain; he is beginning to falter, but he is great and strong, and is not beaten yet. Unconscious of anything but the exciting chase before me, I am suddenly disagreeably reminded that there is such a thing as caution, and necessity to look where you are going to, for, putting his foot in an unusually deep tuca-tuca hole, my little horse comes with a crash upon his head, and turns completely over on his back, burying me beneath him in a hopeless muddle. Fortunately, beyond a shaking, I am unhurt, and remounting, endeavour to rejoin the now somewhat distant chase. The ostrich, Gregorio, and the dog have reached the plain, and as I gallop quickly down the hill I can see that the bird has begun doubling. This is a sure sign of fatigue, and shows that the ostrich's strength is beginning to fail him. Away across the plain the two animals fly, whilst

I and Gregorio press eagerly in their wake. Suddenly the stride of the bird grows slower, his doubles become more frequent, showers of feathers fly in every direction as Plata seizes him by the tail, which comes away in his mouth. In another moment the dog has him by the throat, and for a few minutes nothing can be distinguished but a gray struggling heap."

Not less vivid is the account of the pursuit of a wounded huanaco, or guanaco:—

"At last.....my husband got a shot at a little knot of four or five, who were standing together, almost out of range. One fell, and the others took to their heels. With a cry of triumph we galloped up to the wounded one, but to our dismay, at our approach, he sprang to his feet and started off full speed after his companions, to all appearance unhurt. Spurring our horses, we followed closely in his wake, down steep ravines, up hills, over the plains, at times losing him altogether, but always catching sight of him again, going as fresh as ever, till at last we began to despair of ever running him down. Gradually, and no wonder, our jaded horses began to show signs of exhaustion; we had run them almost to a standstill, and, reflecting on the distance we had to ride back to the camp, we were just going to rein in, when the guanaco suddenly stopped and lay down. But when we had got to within about six yards of him, up he got, and galloped off again, distancing us at every stride. Hesitating what to do, we kept in his wake, though all the time we were wishing we had never started after him. Slower and slower our panting horses struggled towards a ravine, down the side of which the guanaco had disappeared. We came to its edge and looked down. The guanaco was nowhere to be seen. We were at a loss to imagine what could have become of him. He had not climbed the other side, or we should have seen him emerge on the plain, nor could he have gone along the ravine, either to the right or the left, as we commanded a view of it in both directions for a long distance. In this dilemma we were staring open-mouthed with astonishment about us, when something moved in the long grass below, and directing our steps thither we came upon our guanaco lying stretched out in a pool of blood. The movement that had drawn our attention to him had evidently been his last effort, for he was now quite dead. Examining him, we found the bullet had entered his side, and passing through the lungs and lights, had lodged near the spine; and yet, thus severely wounded, he had gone quite ten miles at a cracking pace!"

The writer of these vigorous sketches went to Patagonia because she became wearied of "the shallow artificiality of modern existence," when what was once excitement had ceased to be so, and a longing had grown up within her "to taste a more vigorous emotion than that afforded by the monotonous round of society's so-called 'pleasures.'" Looking round for some country which possessed the qualities necessary to satisfy her, she finally, as she tells us, decided upon Patagonia as the most suitable. And as she hurried to the "scenes of infinite beauty and grandeur" which "might be lying hidden in the silent solitude of the mountains which bound the barren plains of the Pampa, into whose mysterious recesses no one as yet had ever ventured." So long as the fair writer keeps to these scenes her book is beautiful and even touching, but in other passages she makes it but too plain that although she has escaped from "the monotonous round of society's so-called 'pleasures,'" she has scarcely shaken off "the shallow artificiality of modern existence." Her companions were her husband, her two brothers, Lord Quennaherry and Lord James Douglas, and Mr.

J. Beerbohm, an experienced Patagonian traveller. In chapter vi. we are told of an unceremonious visit which they made to an Indian camp, which is well described. In the quietest way Mr. Beerbohm proceeded at the request of Lady Florence to make a sketch of a very "handsome son of the pampa," which after it was finished the lad tore to pieces, much to the travellers' astonishment. In chapter viii. this visit is returned by the Indians, and how they were received is only too frankly told; the narrative is a painful exhibition of unbecoming pride. One of these miserable, mannerless Indians asked for a little coffee. "As may be imagined, he met with an indignant refusal." At last the whole party were induced "to go away by means of a small offering of whisky." If now we turn to chapter xx. we find that one of the lady's brothers and Mr. Beerbohm reached a farmhouse in the bush wood at Cabo Negro, and, "without speaking a word, rushed off to the kitchen, and laid their hands on and utterly devoured what was to have been the breakfast of the farmer and his family," demolishing "the morning meal of a whole household." The insolence of this proceeding is surely its own sufficient condemnation. Lady Florence Dixie and her companions may have been the first to feast their eyes on some of the wonders of Patagonia—it is at best a doubtful fact: we only wish that they may be the last who shall go on a similar errand and not know how to give and take in a generous spirit, befitting an occasion the memory of which will probably endure as long as life itself.

The sketches by Mr. Beerbohm are accurate both in outline and treatment. The horses in "Crossing the Cabeza del Mar" are a little too much like huancos, but the "Ravine Entrance to the Cordillera," "Cleopatra Needles," and "The Wild Horse Glen" are rendered with singular truthfulness.

The Granddiers. From the German of Julius Rodenberg by William Saville. 3 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

'UNDER ST. PAUL'S' begins well if oddly. In a private hotel near the cathedral there are assembled, among others, a cosmopolitan young lady in sufficiently comfortable circumstances to have her own maid and to have travelled over Europe and America, a young American who has travelled still more and been in every sort of adventure, and a handsome young Englishman with 1,500*l.* a year, who has just come to London for the first time, after spending his life at Stratford-on-Avon without ever having been more than fifty miles from home. The young lady is very lively and rather amusing until she falls in love, of course with the handsome Englishman. No doubt she then became doubly interesting to the fortunate person, but the author is too true to nature in making her very uninteresting to others. Then the author breaks down. He has himself observed that one does not hear of difficulties and differences in religious belief having much effect upon people who are in love, and yet he actually ventures to make the remainder of the story entirely depend upon vacillations between religion and Darwinism. At times his writing is clear and vigorous, but he has studied M. Victor Hugo either too much or too little. Two passages may be given as justifying this remark. The first is this:—

"The North invents, the South supplies the tools, the East the hands, the West the patrons and critics of the work, while out of the yellow heart of the city comes the gold, the incentive to the North, South, and East. As St. Paul's is the spiritual centre of London, the Bank is the commercial centre. All the moneyed eyes of the Empire are fixed on that unsightly block of building in Threadneedle Street. If it had any pretensions to architectural beauty or grace—if it had a dome, or a campanile, or a minaret, or anything less tame than its dull, dreary, uninformed walls—that characteristic feature would be looked upon all over the world as the symbol of England's wealth, as the dome, hall, and cross of St. Paul's are regarded as the insignia of the Anglo-Saxon race."

The other is a soliloquy made on Westminster Bridge:—

"London Bridge, which I crossed this morning, is the bridge of commerce. This is the bridge of conquest and of power. At London Bridge begins the sea England rules; at Westminster Bridge lies the first road of land England owns and legislates for. That is the bridge of enterprise, this of dominion. This is the bridge of contrasts."

Mr. Dowling has not succeeded in writing another book so good as his first.

Mr. James Payn, on the contrary, is one of the few novelists who improve. It is only recently that he has come into the front rank, and success has not made him careless. 'A Confidential Agent' is a well-contrived story, full of incident, and sufficiently intricate to mystify the reader. Though the explanation shows that the event which is the first link in the mystery was highly improbable, it is so well kept back and the reader is so well satisfied with the interesting and amusing story that he can feel no resentment. Mr. Payn has given us no chance of guessing the solution of the plot, and it is perhaps comforting to a reader's vanity to find that he has not been baffled owing to any dullness of his own. Besides, the explanation is very short, and leaves room for imagination, or, at least, suggests that if time were allowed the details could be satisfactorily filled in. Mr. Payn's irrepressible good humour carries the reader very easily through his volumes. Even his jokes, some of which are very indifferent, are generally good enough to raise a smile. One reads 'A Confidential Agent' with something of the same sort of pleasure as one feels in meeting an agreeable person in society. Mr. Payn does not put his book into circulation to instruct or to attack, but to amuse and be pleasing to his readers; and he certainly possesses the art, which is as necessary in novel-writing as Lord Beaconsfield has just said it is in conversation, of clothing grave matters in a motley garb.

Mr. Greg reminds his readers in his new novel, which may be described as an epic of Conservatism, a little of himself, and a great deal of Paul Féval and the late George Lawrence. Lionel Darcy, Marquis of Ultramar, is the last son of a house that dates from Charlemagne, or thereabouts; his hands and feet are "notably small"; his face is an epitome of the signs of aristocratic race; he is as accomplished as Jean-Diable, as tremendous as Guy Livingstone, as elaborately rational as Mr. Greg in his most argumentative and intellectual mood. At twenty or so he pistols a reviving tiger; he rescues his enemy's children from a blazing bungalow; he wins the Victoria Cross by gloriously defending a fort against overwhelming odds; and, while recovering from his wounds, he becomes a power in the land by contributing leaders to an influential morning journal. He is nobly and chastely in love with a damsel of high degree; but, out of pity, he permits himself to become the ami intime of a beautiful Eurasian, who dies of an opportune affection of the lungs, and leaves him free to wed the lady of his dreams. This, on principle and on account of general height of moral tone, he declines to do; he prefers instead to kill his enemy—the vulgar son of a Glasgow shopkeeper, as bestial in habit as low-born foils to high-bred heroes are expected to be—in a duel with sabres, and to quit the service a ruined man. After settling an annuity on his enemy's widow and babes, he proceeds to Louisiana, where he exhibits some astonishing pistol practice, and purchases a plantation and a troop of slaves, among them a whole family of lovely octoroons. To these ladies he behaves in a manner distinctly suggestive of Sir Galahad and Dr. Johnson. In the war he takes the side of the chivalrous South, raises a regiment of cavalry, and becomes a real American colonel—a grade to which his author, with something of the true boyish sentiment for the title and its associations, makes him cleave unto the end. The marquis is for some time content to perform prodigies of merely legitimate valour; but after he has avenged an attack on his estate, and outrage done upon the eldest and loveliest of the octoroons, the Guy Livingstone comes out in him. He takes to bestriding a coal-black steed, to brandishing a desperate blade, to crying "Charge!" in trumpet tones on all sorts of momentous occasions, and, at the head of his terrible company, "The Devil's Own," to offering up whole hecatombs of Yankee souls to the shade of the ill-starred octoroon. And in the end, having dreamed a wonderful dream—and proved himself not less heroic as a dreamer than as a marksman—he calls "Charge!" in trumpet tones for the last time, and is in his turn exterminated with his band somewhere in the neighbourhood of Appomattox Court House. As he is a romantic kind of creature, one reads of him with a feeling of amused interest; as he is passably inhuman, and given, even in his most romantic moments, to utterances long-winded and didactic in no mean degree, one lays aside the record of his adventures without regret. As a novel, indeed, 'Errant,' carefully as it is wrought and earnest as are its tone and intention, is of little merit; as a proof of what, in the matter of ideals, indignant Conservatism is sometimes capable, it is of some value.

The author of 'James Gordon's Wife' enters in the story of 'Marjory' upon a field of speculation which is, perhaps, too important for the pages of what is otherwise purely a novel. The effect of sudden and crushing misfortune and the apparent denial of all their wishes in regard to temporal well-being act upon Hugh Vivian, the careless son of rich parents, and Marjory, the piously educated niece of a clergyman, in different ways. Hugh rejects religion, and writes against it with the zeal of one endeavouring to persuade himself against a half conviction which irritates him; Marjory, after a struggle, gives up her faith in despair. But in the mean time the influence of Marjory's character has worked a revolution in Hugh's sentiments, and in his turn he comes to the relief of Marjory's mental distress. The exonerated of her lover from certain charges which circumstances long prevented him from disproving completes the cure; and the hero and heroine begin their married life in cheerful accord. That they are also largely recouped for the loss of their worldly fortunes, though in a sense satisfactory, does not add to the force of the moral. The story is well written in its way, though the nature of the subject puts it outside the range of merely literary criticism.

'Twixt Friend and Foe' is a tale of revenge, and it has in consequence some unpleasant features, which might frighten away the reader who prefers a bright romance or a straightforward love story. It is also a little loose in diction, improbable in parts, and a trifle overdrawn, so that the balance of first impressions may turn against it. But in spite of all this there is sufficient in the book to tempt any one who has begun it, and caught sight of the plot, to read steadily through to the end. The least pleasing aspect in the story is the motive of the revenge, which is imposed on a noble and generous man by a hot-blooded West Indian, the sufferer of the original wrong, as a dying bequest. As the wrong was inflicted at school, and was the result of boyish cowardice rather than malice aforethought, there is clearly no adequate reason why an officer in the army should accept from one of his privates the duty of hunting down a man whom he had not previously known, and who had done him personally no harm. There must be much that is good in the story to overcome the prejudice caused by such a feeble motive for such a cruel purpose; and, on the whole, this prejudice is overcome. 'Twixt Friend and Foe' is decidedly interesting, and its substance is better than its conception or its manner of relation. The hero is well drawn for a central figure. Many of the incidents are sensational, but there is a power in details which prevents the sensationalism from being often offensive; and, after all, though we have called this novel a tale of revenge, it will be found that the author's bite is not so bad as her bark.

'The Grandidiere' is a story of Berlin middle-class life. Its chief defect is to be found in the laboured and long-drawn-out grotesque which too frequently passes in German novels for humour. A half-crazy but amiable revolutionary, who calls himself (goodness knows why) the colonel, and imagines it to be a joke to call his strolling servant the major, his horse the lieutenant, and his dog the corporal, is at least characteristic. The family which gives name to the book is an old refugee family, established in Berlin as hatters ever since the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. A breach in the succession is threatened by the insubordination of Edward Grandidier, but of course all comes right, and the book closes amid the rejoicings at the reunion of Alsace to Germany "for ever." The last two words, by the way, express, perhaps, a little over confidence on the part of Herr Rodenberg. For ever is a very long time. 'The Grandidiere' is, on the whole, fairly well translated.

ORIENTAL LITERATURE.

Linguistic and Oriental Essays. Written from the Year 1846 to 1878. By R. N. CUST, I.C.S. (Trübner & Co.).—Mr. Cust has often done good service to the cause of Oriental learning by an opportune article in an Indian or European periodical, which has helped to awaken public interest in some new discovery of science; and we are glad to see these scattered reviews thus collected in one volume. They are very varied in subjects: thus some treat of the 'Rāmāyana,' 'The Languages' and 'The Religions of India,' 'Egyptology,' 'The Phœnician Alphabet,' and 'Monumental Inscriptions,' while others are devoted to topics of more immediate and practical interest, as 'Sikhland; or, the Country of Baba Nānak,' 'The Collector of Land Revenue in India,' 'Civil Justice in the Panjāb,' 'An Indian District during a Rebellion,' 'Oriental Congresses,' and 'Oriental Scholars.' The best articles of the former series are those on the religions and languages of India, which give a capital survey of these wide and difficult subjects, and they well deserve the honour they have received in being translated into French as one of the recent volumes of the "Bibliothèque Orientale Elzévirienne." It is, however, the latter series which will be most likely to interest the English reader. In many of these the author speaks with the authority of personal experience; and the reader can easily understand that the words of the preface are literally true where it is said that "some of the essays were written in the tent under the shade of the mango grove, or in the solitary staging bungalow; notes for others were jotted down on a log in a native village, or in a boat floating down one of the five rivers on the track of Alexander the Great, or on an excursion in the mountains of the Himalaya." It is this constant association with the country and the people described which gives such a vividness to many of the pages. The scientific articles are clear and accurate résumés of their respective subjects, but they contain little which is original; each of these Indian essays is an episode in an Indian career, and tells us something of that far-off land which must always seem strange to those who have never lived in it. The most interesting of these essays are those on 'The Collector of Land Revenue' and 'Civil Justice in the Panjāb.' The author has, perhaps, been unavoidably tempted to view the achievements of British rule with too favourable an eye; some readers may be inclined to doubt whether all his bright colours are deserved. Mr. Cust sometimes touches lightly on problems which to a home-abiding Englishman do not seem so easily solved; but he always writes with a kindly heart, and he has the unspeakable advantage of knowing his subject from a continued experience of years. It is with especial interest that we quote the generous words of the preface:—"Some of the last words of my master, Lord

Lawrence, in India were, 'Be kind to the natives.' I would go even further, and say, 'Take an interest in, and try to love them.' They are the heirs (perhaps the spendthrift heirs) of an ancient but still surviving civilization. And how far superior are they to the modern Egyptian or the dwellers of Mesopotamia, the bankrupt heirs of a still more ancient but exhausted civilization! How superior are they to the equatorial and tropical African, who never had any civilization at all!" This is the spirit with which Indian civil servants should be imbued. Our competitive examinations will not give them this, one of the most essential requisites; but they should land in India with the feeling already implanted, and it is such essays as these of Mr. Cust's which may well help to kindle this generous enthusiasm in the young man when he first looks forward to an Indian career.

It is not generally known in Europe that Nawal Kishor, the enterprising publisher in Lucknow, has been lately issuing cheap editions of the most celebrated Persian classics, which, if they were only procurable by European scholars, would help more than anything else to awaken an interest in the treasures of Persian literature. We have seen copies of his editions of Nizām's five epics (the 'Makhsūn ul Asrār' with a commentary); the entire works of Anwarī; the 'Diwān' and 'Kasidāh' of 'Urī (the latter with a commentary); and the little-known 'Masnavi' of Zulāfi—the history of Mahmūd and Ayāz—with a copious commentary. Beside these he has also printed editions of the 'Seven Thrones' of Jāmī, the entire works of Khākhāni, and the poems of Shams-i-Tabrīz. The texts printed differ in accuracy; some of Nizām's poems, for instance, are badly edited, but some of the editions are well printed and accurate. Can no enterprising English bookseller be found who will carry out the old wish of the stage heroine,

To gods, annihilate but space and time
And make Persian lovers happy?

London and Lucknow are surely within reach of some intercommunication; and fairly accurate texts, lithographed so as to be easily legible, are the great want of Oriental scholars in Europe.

Metrical Translations from Sanskrit Writers. With an Introduction, Prose Versions, and Parallel Passages from Classical Authors. By JOHN MUIR, D.C.L. (Trübner & Co.).—This volume, one of Messrs. Trübner's 'Oriental Series,' is a reprint of Dr. Muir's 'Religious and Moral Sentiments from Sanskrit Writers,' with the addition of other collections of the same kind hitherto unpublished, and of the metrical pieces in vols. ii. and v. of the author's 'Original Sanskrit Texts.' The body of the work consists entirely of metrical translations, and in two appendices Dr. Muir gives prose translations of the same passages and parallels from the Bible and classical writers. The extracts are almost entirely gnomic, and the metrical translation does not pretend to any high poetic merit. It may be doubted how far the eight-syllable line of Scott, Dr. Muir's favourite metre, is fitted to represent the śloka or any common form of Sanskrit metre, and there are, perhaps, too many lines like

Who first investigates the facts,
And then deliberately acts.

P. 141.

The immense majority of the extracts come from the 'Mahābhārata,' which, whether in its original form or not, was a repository of wisdom as well as an heroic poem; the rest of the book is made up mostly from the 'Rig Veda,' 'Manu,' the 'Rāmāyana,' and the 'Pancatantra.' Sanskrit philosophy never seems to have concerned itself much with ethics, and Indian moral philosophy remained in a condition of gnomic precepts, such as are familiar from Greek poets like Theophrastus and form so prominent a feature in Euripides. The scope and tendency of these precepts are usually quite practical, "thoughtful men pursue two aims, duty and prosperity"; sometimes they are Antinomian, as xiv., though such views are generally refuted immediately after; and sometimes they take high ground, and insist on the purest and most unselfish motives for action. But there is no ethical system; the only rule to follow is custom (xxvi.).

He must bid, however wise,
A sure unerring norm supplies;
The only rule is,—no's or forms
The honest read the many tale.

Most of the classical parallels are supplied, as might perhaps be expected, from Euripides, but many more could be got from such authors as Seneca, who reproduce the gnomic precepts of an earlier time from the point of view of a complete philosophical system. Extract v. is the remarkable impeachment and vindication of the Divine Government from the 'Mahābhārata'; Drapadi's attacks in words that remind us of Omar Khayyām (the "tanta stat pœdite culpa" of Lucretius), and Yudhishtira replies in an optimistic strain. To illustrate the fatalism of Drapadi might be quoted the most remarkable expression of Stoic fatalism, Cleanthes' lines:—

'Αγὼν δὲ μὴ δὲ Ζεὺς καὶ οὐ γ' ἡ συμπαγὴν θεοῦ νόμῳ ἴσθις ἀπὸ δειρῶν ἄνθρωπος, ὅς ἐστιν αἰὶν ὁ δειρὸς· οἷός ἐστι μὴ θάνατον καὶ οὐ γὰρ γινώσκεις, οὐδὲρ οἷός ἐστι θάνατον.

The passages of Plato quoted here are, of course, so far in point, but it might be well to explain how they are due to his dualistic view of God and matter, which is evil. There are many other coincidences with Greek philosophies on various points; xlvii. gives a rule on virtue, much like the ἔστι doctrine of Aristotle; l. reminds us of the position held by Plato and Aristotle, that part of ψυχή was common to man and beasts; parts of lxxiv. give not only an ontology like the Stoics, but also an approach to their ethical doctrine of harmony with nature and ἀρετή; cxxiv. suggests the ἡδοναὶ καὶ πόνος of Carneades.

A bounded vault the ether crown;
With fire the body comes to shine;
And yet no bounds the sky contain;
The earth with fire the body gleams.
So other men, great times for them,
Which else might claim, should first be tried;
And those who have every test abide Should only then be deemed as true.

cxlii. is a curious contradiction of the Scriptural view; it is hard for the poor man to attain heaven, for he cannot duly perform the proper rites. It is an interesting question how far Buddhism affected this great mass of sentiment found in the 'Mahābhārata'. The depreciation of excessive caste feeling in lxxviii.-xc. and the high tone of many other precepts are very probably due to Buddhist influences; cxxiv., one of these, is from the 'Pancatantra', where such influences have for some time been recognised. Dr. Muir's introduction is directed to a discussion of Lommel's well-known theory that the 'Bhagavadgītā' is full of Christian morality drawn from Christian sources. The different views especially of Lassen and A. Weber are stated with great fairness, and Dr. Muir's opinion is evidently not in favour of Lommel. Indeed, it is one implicit purpose of the book to show how much Indian morality of a high kind must be, in all probability, independent of Christian influence. cxli. gives at length one of those singular parallels between the legend of Buddha and the New Testament which have been at least sufficiently insisted on by writers on Buddhism.

We have received Mr. Driver's edition of A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs attributed to Abraham ibn Ezra, from a MS. in the Bodleian Library (Oxford, Clarendon Press). This is the third commentary which has been attributed to the famous Abraham ibn Ezra, the two others being really by Joseph Kimhi and his son Moses. It is curious, as Mr. Driver points out in his preface, that only one hundred years after Abraham ibn Ezra's death, Raymundus Martini, in his 'Pugio Fidei', quotes two passages as from the commentary of this author which in reality belong to that of Joseph Kimhi. That Abraham ibn Ezra wrote a commentary on Proverbs is proved from his own commentaries on other Biblical books, and we may perhaps conclude that his commentary was eagerly sought for from the fact that scribes gave out as Ibn Ezra's commentaries by other authors, apparently for the purpose of satisfying the demands of collectors of books. This third commentary, so well edited by Mr. Driver, bears in many passages striking resemblance to the style and the interpretation of Ibn Ezra. Who the author is, and whether the forger is the scribe or the author himself, remains at present unknown.

The first volume of Dr. Ginsburg's splendid edition of the Masorah alphabetically arranged contains the letters Aleph to Yod. It is a labour of great learning and patience, and deserves, no doubt, the attention of Hebrew scholars. We must, however, postpone our review until the text is complete and the prolegomena published, in order to be able to give a full account of the MSS. made use of by the editor and of his theories on the origin of the Masorah and on the various Masoretic schools.

Die Inschriften Tiglath-Pileser's I. By Dr. W. Lotz. (Leipzig, Hinrichs.)—This volume will be found of great value by the Assyrian student, since it contains a very considerable number of important additions to our knowledge of the Assyrian syllabary and lexicon, contributed partly by the author himself, partly by his teacher, Prof. Friedrich Delitzsch, as well as corrections of the meanings hitherto assigned to certain words. Not only have the published texts, as revised by Prof. Delitzsch, been used for the purpose, but also a good many unpublished ones copied by Prof. Delitzsch at the British Museum. The book will be equally valuable to the historian, as it presents him with a translation of the long cylinder inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I., brought up for the first time to the level of our present knowledge of Assyrian. The inscription was chosen in 1857 as a test of the reality of Assyrian decipherment, and the substantial agreement between the independent translations of it made by Sir H. Rawlinson, Dr. Hincks, Mr. Fox Talbot, and Dr. Oppert was considered a fair proof that the decipherment rested on a solid foundation. Since then, in spite of the great progress made in Assyriology, no revised translation of the inscription has appeared, so that the one now published by Dr. Lotz is particularly welcome. As Tiglath-Pileser I. lived in the twelfth century before our era, and has left us a detailed account of his campaigns in Western Asia, Cappadocia, and Kurdistan, the importance of an accurate translation of it for ancient history and geography cannot be easily over-estimated. Among the many new facts contained in the volume is one which will have a special interest for zoologists. Dr. Lotz has proved that the Assyrian word which has generally been translated "horse" has really been borrowed from the ancient Accadian language, and means "an elephant," while the compound ideograph usually supposed to signify "a wild bull" also denotes the same animal. As Tiglath-Pileser states that he hunted these creatures in the neighbourhood of Carchemish, it is plain that the elephant, which was hunted in the same locality by the Egyptian king Thothmes III., continued to exist in this part of Western Asia at least three or four centuries later.

Dr. G. Oppert, of the Madras Educational Department, contributes to the Madras Journal of Literature and Science, of which he is the editor, an elaborate article on The Weapons, Army Organization, and Political Maxims of the Ancient Hindus, with Special Reference to Gunpowder and Firearms. He endeavours to prove that the use of gunpowder and its application to the discharge of missiles from projectile weapons were known in India from the earliest times, and endorses the opinion that the knowledge of it was brought to Europe from India by the Saracens. Whether China received the knowledge from India, or vice versa, he thinks that there is now no means of deciding. He quotes a prescription for making gunpowder from the Sanskrit work 'Sukranu', which work he considers to be anterior to or contemporary with our revision of Mann's 'Dharmasāstra'. He makes no attempt, however, to fix more definitely the date of this newly-discovered work, and we fear that he has been imposed upon by some modern forgery. The whole article, in fact, bears on its face too many marks of haste and carelessness to inspire much confidence in the author's judgment on a point of criticism. Still we believe, like Dr. Oppert, in the early acquaintance of the Hindus with gunpowder and its use in war. India produces all the component parts of gunpowder, and the Hindus are very likely to have discovered and used the compound as early as Dr. Oppert believes.

Études sur la Religion des Scythas ou Sabéens. Par M. N. Sioffi. (Paris, Leroux.)—Although not a portion of Arabic literature, M. Sioffi, who is French Vice-Consul at Moscow, has made a very interesting work from the oral communications received about the Scythas from Adam, one of the sect. Their language is a corruption of the Chaldean, that is, the neo-Chaldean, not the old language of the Assyrians or Babylonians, mixed, as can readily be conceived, with numerous Arabic words. The same may be said of their religion, which is a mixture of an ancient paganism with Christianity and Mohammedanism. They abhor, however, the peculiar rites of Judaism and Islam, although observing some of the ceremonies of Mohammedanism, as the Ramadan, and retaining the Jewish rite of sacrifice and the baptism of Christianity. Although some of their traditions show traces of an older religion, they are so blended with later notions that they are of little or no historical value. The ideas of hell of this people resemble those of the Egyptians and Buddhists, and are apparently derived from pagan sources.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Mrs. HELEN and Mrs. ALICE ZIMMERN have gathered together in their two volumes, Half-Hours with Foreign Novelists (Romington & Co.), a goodly company of foreign novelists, of whom, by dint of translated specimens and critical and biographical introductions, they endeavour to give some idea to English readers. George Sand, Murger, Daudet, Cherbuliez, Feuillet, Balzac, Gaboriau, and Sandeau represent France; Auerbach, Stifter, Spielhagen, Reicher-Maench, Hackländer, Freytag, Marlitt, and Heyne, Germany and Austria; Buken-Huet and Booboom-Toussaint, Holland; Farina, Italy; Carlen, Sweden; Jokai, Hungary; Tourguénief and Kraewski, Russia; Caballero, Spain; Bjornson, Norway; and Keller, Switzerland. This enumeration of the late provided is probably much a case the best criticism to offer on the book, though there is perhaps room for some demur as to insertions and omissions. The selectors confess that they have had, especially in their French list, to exclude several names of secondary importance. Among these they specify M. About, and we must say that there is more than one name in the list of the accepted whose "primariness," as compared with M. About's secondariness, we feel inclined to deny. Besides, what is to be said as to the exclusion of Flaubert, who is easily excerptible, and whom not a few critics of weight regard as the greatest not merely of French but of European novelists during the last quarter of a century? George Sand and Balzac, too, are authors scarcely to be "sampled" in some twenty pages. However, these are objections to which almost all volumes of selections are exposed. It would have been well, as a matter of convenience, if the comment and introduction had been distinguished from the translations by some difference of type, or at least by some greater breach in the printing than we see here. The authors are not always happy in their criticisms, but differences of opinion in such cases are unavoidable. A heavier charge is that the extracts are frequently, if not always, too short for enjoyment or for really intelligent appreciation of the peculiarities of the originals. But if the book sends readers to those originals it will have deserved well. There are some awkwardnesses of style in it; "lengths," for instance, is not English in the peculiar sense in which in French there are said to be longueurs in a book.

Messrs. HODDER & STOUGHTON send us a biography of Henry Martyn, by Canon Bell, which is neither better nor worse than the usual run of what are termed religious biographies.

Mr. WARNE has done a service by reprinting in his "Chandos Classics" Gibbon's delightful autobiography and some of his letters; but why add a fragment of the "Decline and Fall" which has no connexion with the life of Gibbon, and printed thus by itself has little value? It would have been better to give more of the letters.

THE annual volumes of the Leisure Hour and Sunday at Home call for no especial notice. Both periodicals deservedly retain the favour of their special public, and do credit to the Religious Tract Society. Some of the woodcuts are good, but the coloured illustrations are not so pleasing. — Little Folks (Cassell & Co.), Little Wide Awake (Routledge & Co.), Golden Childhood (Ward, Lock & Co.), and the Sunday Scholar's Companion (Church of England Sunday School Institute) are addressed to younger readers. Of the four, Little Folks and Little Wide Awake are the best. The Sunday Scholar's Companion is in many respects well done. Golden Childhood also contains much that is good, but it is disfigured by "beautiful coloured illustrations" which are simply deplorable.

The Economical Housewife, which Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. send us, is one of the many treatises written with the laudable object of instructing young and ignorant housekeepers. It contains some excellent recipes, and much good advice, given, however, in rather a confused fashion.

ALMANACS are beginning to appear, and some established favourites, published by the Company of Stationers, are on our table: Whitaker's Clergyman's Diary and Gilbert's Almanac and The British Almanac and Companion. The Companion opens with a good article on weather forecasting by Mr. R. H. Scott, and a sketch of the history of the Greenwich Observatory by Mr. Lynn. — Eason's Almanac for Ireland contains some valuable statistical information. Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son publish it.

No Christmas Cards we have seen this year are better than those sent us by Messrs. Marcus Ward & Co. They are of all kinds and suited to varied tastes. Some of them are particularly splendid. — Mr. Ackermann has sent us two delightful Fairyland Cards by Miss Thomson, as well as a selection of Frang's American Christmas Cards, one or two of which are excellent.

THE Pocket-Books and Diaries of Messrs. De La Rue & Co. are, as usual, luxurious in the extreme. No firm turns out more dainty work than they, and they never, in seeking after splendour, pass the limits of good taste. Nothing could be more satisfactory in every way than the publications now on our table.

We have on our table A History of English Literature, by F. A. Laing (Collins & Sons), — The Beginner's Latin Exercise Book, by Rev. C. H. Dawe (Rivingtons), — The First Four Books of Xenophon's Anabasis, edited by W. W. Goodwin and J. W. White (Macmillan), — Elementary Algebra, with Brief Notices of its History, Part I, by R. Potts (Longmans), — Thoughts on Education, by the Rev. I. G. Smith (Parker), — A Simple Treatise on Heat, by W. M. Williams (Chatto & Windus), — The Plum, by D. T. Fish ('The Bazaar' Office), — On Musical Education, by A. B. Bach (Blackwood), — The Mistletoe Bough, edited by Miss Braddon (J. & R. Maxwell), — Faith's Father, by F. M. Holmes (Cassell), — His Father, by S. K. Hocking (Warne), — Peggy Ophir's Inheritance (Cassell), — The Count of Talavera, by J. van Lennep, translated by A. Arnold (Nimmo & Bain), — Stories and Romances, by H. E. Scudder (Trübner), — The Poetical Works of J. Greenleaf Whittier, edited by W. M. Rossetti (Ward & Lock), — The Classical Poetry of the Japanese, by B. H. Chamberlain (Trübner), — In Bible Lands, by Rev. R. Newton, D.D. (Nelson), — The Age of the Great Patriarchs, Vol. II, by R. Tuck (Sunday School Union), — In Prospect of Sunday, by the Rev. G. S. Bowes (Nisbet), — Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études, 2 vols., by L. Havet (Paris, Vieweg), — L'Eau de Jouvence, by E. NOTES FROM OXFORD.

December, 1880.

THE one absorbing topic of conversation just now is the proposed scheme of reform put out by the University Commissioners. First came the Professorial Statute, and now we have the draft statutes of eight important colleges. — Balliol, Christ Church, Lincoln, Magdalen, Queen's, All Souls, Exeter, and Corpus. We have thus for the first time something like adequate materials for forming a judgment upon the new constitution which is to be imposed upon us. These first official utterances of the Commissioners have naturally caused a considerable flutter. The main body of the professors especially is in a high state of indignation at the regulations newly devised for their benefit, and a lively fire of broadsheets and memorials has commenced, which threatens in some degree to obscure the most important issues at stake. As to certain points in the general scheme not much difference of opinion exists. Only a small and a dwindling minority will regret the almost entire disappearance of clerical restrictions. The creation of fresh professorships, notably one of classical archaeology, and the provision enabling colleges to elect to fellowships without examination "persons engaged in some literary and scientific work," are welcome indications that the interests of learning have not been wholly disregarded. In the proposed "Councils of Faculties" it is reasonable to recognise the germs of what may in time develop into an effective organisation of the teaching power in the University; and, lastly, the prize fellowships, limited in value to 200*l.* a year, tenable for seven years only, and reduced in numbers, will fully answer their purpose as prizes, without unfairly taxing the resources of a college.

Undoubtedly the great blot upon the new scheme, so far as it is known, is the uncertainty in which it leaves the all-important question of the relation to be established between university and college teaching. Co-operation between these is of the first importance, and can only be established by some such external authority as that of the present Commission. Such co-operation might have been secured in one of two ways. It would have been possible for the Commissioners to have laid down explicitly the principle that collegiate teaching should stand first, to have made this teaching as complete as possible—enforcing, where necessary, a certain amount of inter-collegiate combination—and then to have limited the functions of the professoriate to filling up such gaps as still remained. A professoriate so entirely auxiliary need not have been numerous, and it must have been carefully subordinated to the principal machinery. Such a scheme would have been utterly distasteful to many of us, as involving a sacrifice of the higher education to the lower, but it would have found admirers, and would at least have been consistent. A far better plan would have been to recognise the university teaching as entitled to the first place, to have created a university staff, capable at once of representing the different departments of knowledge and of covering the entire area of study, and to have placed in its hands the general control of the education of our students. On this plan room would still have been found for college tutors as subordinate assistants in the work of lecturing, and, above all, as personally supervising the private studies of undergraduates, and administering the internal discipline and economy of their respective colleges. But their numbers would have been materially reduced, and their autonomy in the matter of teaching considerably restricted. What we complain of is that the Commissioners have failed to see that their choice lay between these two alternatives, and have attempted instead an impossible compromise. With the very best motives they have increased the numerical strength of the professoriate, raised the scale of payment, added an auxiliary cohort of readers, and have insisted, reasonably enough, that this powerful body shall come forward and take an active part in the instruction of undergraduates. But human nature is weak, and it is clear that when they found themselves face to face with the representatives of the various colleges, and discussed one by one the separate college schemes, they yielded to the natural demands of collegiate ambition and energy, and sanctioned in each case the establishment or the retention of a collegiate staff on a scale utterly inconsistent with the ample provision they were independently making for the same needs. Thus, with an infinite waste of money and power, and to the confusion of all economical minds, we have two rival and costly systems set to work on much the same ground. The competition which must ensue between them is in itself a serious evil, but those who deplore the extent to which the best energies of the University have hitherto been absorbed by undergraduate education of a rather narrow and special kind will see with regret and alarm that this absorption is likely to be more complete than ever. For, in addition to a large body of college tutors, appointed and paid for this work, the tendency of the new scheme will be to turn the efforts of the professoriate in the same direction. If the professors are to not up to the spirit of the new regulations, and fill their lecture rooms with undergraduates, they must outbid the college tutors, and offer lectures still more practical and still more nicely adapted to the requirements of the examinations. Into the more special grievances complained of by the professors as created by this scheme I need not enter, as they have already been amply ventilated in the press, and they are, after all, of secondary importance as compared with the radical defect which has been discussed above.

For other local matters a passing notice must suffice. It is now settled that the University shall endow Prof. Monier Williams's Indian Institute with 250*l.* a year on certain conditions. No site, however, has yet been found for the building, nor has any one more than a very vague notion what the Institute is really to be, while opinions as to what it ought to be vary almost indefinitely. The "Greek question" is still in abeyance. The adverse vote at Cambridge was a serious discouragement to those who have been advocating the remission of Greek in certain cases, but fresh efforts will, no doubt, be made, and it is hoped that some concerted action between the two universities may be arranged.

It will be remembered that early in this year we were enabled, by the generosity of a member of the University, to take one step in the direction of establishing archaeological schools abroad on the French and German plan by sending out a single travelling student. Mr. Ramsay, who was selected for the post, was despatched to Smyrna, and it is gratifying to be able to point to his articles in the first number of the new Journal for Hellenic Studies as evidence that so far the experiment has been thoroughly successful.

It is also pleasant to be able to notice the increasing vitality displayed by our Philological Society here. The number of meetings has been increased, the average attendance is larger, and there is no lack of papers.

AUTHORS AND PRINTERS' READERS.

Dec. 4, 1880.

THERE are few authors who do not require to be sub-edited. The very familiarity of a man with the matter he has written causes him to overlook blunders in his proofs, and detection distresses him only when his book is stitched and bound and in the hands of the critics. An author has some right to look for help to the printer's reader. In times not so ancient, for I can recall them, proofs used to reach authors well noted with points of interrogation, pregnant with interlinear criticism, and abounding in suggestions for punctuation. One was not always particularly obliged for these hints; but they proved care and even solicitude on the part of the printer's reader. Now, proofs come to one almost in their raw state. The author has not only to do his own, but the work of the printer's reader also. Worse still; whether, because he is not uniformly expert in the symbolism of the trade, or because compositors have developed of late years decided opinions of their own on the subjects of grammar, spelling, and punctuation, the author finds that a good many of the corrections he makes are not attended to; but this he only discovers when it is too late to mend the errors, for printers are no longer liberal in revise-slips, and when an author returns what used to be called a first proof, he commonly hears no more of it until reviews of his book, kindly posted to him by friends, begin to reach him. All this is my humble experience of several printers, and I don't doubt other authors could top my testimony with painful stories. Perhaps you will think I have some right to complain, for had all the corrections made by me in the proofs of 'A Sailor's Sweetheart' been attended to, or had I been favoured with second proofs, not only two of the three errors your critic indicated, but half a dozen others which he has been kind enough to pass over, would not have appeared; and a generous and encouraging reviewer would have been spared the necessity of ending a notice singularly agreeable to me by a caustic reference to "oversights." Much, indeed, may be said in favour of a printer's reader who has to read a sea-story. The indignation excited by a mass of nautical terms is only to be appeased by letting "stem" stand for "stern," to the confusion of the author; and if "truck" can be sneaked in for "top" and "main stay" for "main sail" the thirst of vengeance may be taken as almost satisfied. Still I would respectfully submit that even a nautical novelist is entitled to some consideration from printers' readers. At all events, I am pretty sure in making my complaint that I am stating the case of a good many authors who, like myself, are wretched proof-readers.

W. CLARE RUSSELL.

MOUNT ATHOS.

PROF. LAMBROS, of Athens, has published a statement, addressed to the Greek Senate, of the results of his mission to investigate the libraries of the monasteries of Mount Athos. These, he confesses, are to some extent disappointing, as he found no hitherto unknown works of distinguished classical writers. The following may be mentioned as the most important discoveries:—(1) a treatise on natural history, by the Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, consisting of excerpts from Aristotle, Elian, and other ancient authors; (2) several collections of classical proverbs; (3) an ancient grammatical treatise on Greek dialectic peculiarities; (4) thirteen mediæval popular songs, with accompanying music. These and many others M. Lambros and his fellow labourers have copied, and propose to publish; and he has also compiled a catalogue of the MSS. of all the monasteries except the two largest, Lavra and Vatopedi, and these, too, he hopes to investigate at a future time. The catalogue, which is also to be published, already contains 5,766 MSS. He does not think that the imperial bulls which exist on Athos have any great historical or philological value, and some of them he found to be spurious, so that they would require to be edited with circumspection. The most valuable of the printed books were Aldines, and books in modern Greek earlier than the War of Independence, copies of which are not to be met with elsewhere. By the help of M. Gillieron he also obtained copies of some of the most important frescoes, and of illuminations in various MSS. Many hard things have been said of the monks for their carelessness in respect of the contents of their libraries, but hardly anything so severe as M. Lambros's condemnation of them. He compares his work of investigation to cleaning an Augean stable.

Literary Gossip.

THE two volumes (III. and IV.) of Prince Metternich's Memoirs which Mr. Bentley has in the press will contain some interesting letters, exhibiting the great statesman amid the sorrows and enjoyments of private life, as well as comments on the occurrences of the eventful years 1816-1829. The political movements which occupied Metternich's attention during these years were the revolutions in Italy and Spain, the first restoration in France, the revolution in Greece, and the opening of the Eastern Question. The letters abound in remarks on the distinguished persons who then appeared on the theatre of European history. The Emperor Alexander again occupies a prominent position, and the accounts of Metternich's relations with the English statesmen Wellington, Castlereagh, and Canning are especially interesting. It is curious to notice the fear and dread with which Canning's measures were invariably regarded.

MAJOR SERPA PINTO, who has recovered from his protracted illness, has come to London to bring out his book descriptive of his journey across Africa. It is satisfactory to find that the title is altered from 'The King's Rifle' to 'How I Crossed Africa.' 'The King's Rifle' might be a good name for a boy's book of adventures by Mayne Reid or Gustave Aimard, but it seems rather out of place on the title-page of a serious book of African travel.

A PROJECT has been started for marking, by some suitable monument, the spot where the corpse of Shelley was burned in 1822 on the sea coast near Viareggio. Some gentlemen belonging to Shelley's own college in Oxford, University College, whence he was summarily expelled in 1811, are taking the first steps in this matter: a fitting and laudable act of expiation.

PROF. MONIER WILLIAMS, C.I.E., will contribute a paper on the religion of Zoroaster to the January number of the Nineteenth Century.

PROF. HUXLEY is preparing a volume on Berkeley for Mr. John Morley's series of "English Men of Letters."

THE second volume of the selected descriptive portions of Mr. Ruskin's 'Stones of Venice' is in the hands of the printer, and will probably be ready early in the new year.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will shortly republish in a small volume the letters on the Irish Land Question recently contributed to the Daily Telegraph by Mr. Charles Russell, Q.C., M.P.

THE Manuscript Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has recently received two notable additions in (1) a folio volume on vellum of the eleventh century, containing a manuscript of the Vulgate (Genesis xxxiv. 10-4 Reg. xviii. 27),—the very copy which has been classed by Vercellone as Codex U; and (2) a small volume (3½ in. by 5½ in.) containing extracts from Gregory of Nyssa, Dionysius of Alexandria, and other contemporary writers, copied out in the twelfth century. The binding appears to indicate that the volume was once in the Imperial Library at Constantinople.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & Co. will publish before Christmas a story by Mrs. Holman Hunt, entitled 'Children at Jerusalem: a Sketch of Modern Life in Syria.' The work will contain a frontispiece by the author.

M. ÉLIE BERGER, of the École Française at Rome, is engaged upon a book with the title of 'Les Registres d'Innocent IV., Recueil des Bulles de ce Pape,' from MSS. in the Vatican Library and the National Library at Paris.

PROF. H. MÜLLER, of Vienna, is engaged upon a grammar of the Sabeen language.

SPANISH commentators and critics have presented to the reader Cervantes as a theologian, a moralist, a philosopher, a lawyer, a doctor, a geographer, a sailor, a soldier, a political economist, and as the moral reformer of his age. The last to enter the lists is Señor Foronda, who has now printed 'Cervantes a Traveller.' His pamphlet is accompanied by a map indicating the localities visited and described by the author of

'Don Quixote.' "Cervantes," writes our author, "merits this appellation not only on account of his journeyings in Spain, but because he visited Italy, Greece, Turkey, Portugal, the Azores, and the coast of Africa, and tells us all he found noteworthy in those countries."

At a recent meeting of the Lisbon Academy of Sciences, Mr. Henry H. Howorth was nominated a Corresponding Member, on account of his work 'The History of the Mongols.' Mr. Howorth has a connexion with Lisbon, as he was born there, his father being the head of a well-known Manchester firm of those days. On the same occasion Senhor Luiz Garrido read some chapters of a critical study he has prepared on Mr. Froude's 'Life of Julius Cæsar.' The work is written in French, and will shortly be published.

HERR SPIELHAGEN will shortly publish a new novelette, which is defined by himself as a pendant to his latest work, 'Quisiana.' The name is to be 'Angela,' after the heroine. The scene is laid in the autumn of 1871, on the shores of the Lake of Geneva.

THE Saale Zeitung states that Prof. Arndt, of Leipzig, is the fortunate discoverer of a hitherto unknown work by Goethe. The news is confirmed by a Leipzig correspondent of the Basler Nachrichten. The new discovery is a "Singspiel" in prose, and it will shortly be printed. Prof. Arndt has for some time been occupied in the study of Goethe's life and writings.

THE monthly publication of the Benares College called the Pandit having been discontinued, a new series of Sanscrit texts is to be issued in its place. The series will consist of hitherto unpublished texts, edited mainly by the Pandits of the college, under the superintendence of Mr. R. Griffith, M.A., Director of Public Instruction N.W.P. and Oudh, and Dr. Thibaut, Principal of Benares College. Explanatory notes and indexes, &c., will accompany the texts when deemed necessary. English translations of the texts and new editions of texts already published will from time to time be introduced. The series will be issued in parts similar to those of the Bibliotheca Indica.

THE Indian Mirror says that a Bengali gentleman has applied to the London University for permission to compete for its B.A. examination from India. It considers that the granting of such an application would have a most injurious effect on the progress of Indian universities. Owing, amongst other things, to the fact that Indian educational corporations are not recognized by English universities, an Indian would prefer to take the London degree, if it could be obtained without his coming to this country.

By order of the Sultan Arabic newspapers are to be started at Mecca, Bagdad, and Aleppo.

SCIENCE

Life and her Children. By Arabella B. Buckley. (Stanford.)

THIS is an excellent book for children, written in a charming and at the same time lucid style. Books for children about vertebrate animals are common enough; the present work, however, treats of invertebrates only, and tells children all about monads, amoebæ, sponges, starfish, insects, and crustacea, giving a good deal of interesting information on anatomy. The instruction contained in the book appears to be sound throughout, and here for the first time in a book of the kind we find the structure of sponges properly described, and the ancient fallacy as to their being colonies of Amœbæ given up. The book is full of illustrations, most of them drawn by Dr. Wild, late artist of the Challenger expedition. Some of them appear to be type etchings, and not woodcuts, and thus look somewhat rough, although they are all very effective. We have not noticed any errors in the book, but some of the terms used might, we think, be altered with advantage. We object most strongly to the term "laseo-cell" for the thread-cells of Coelenterata. A laseo is a cord or thong with a slip noose at the end of it, and nothing else; the noose is the essential part of the instrument. There is nothing in any possible way resembling a slip-noose or noose of any kind in the "thread-cell," and when the Coelenterata come to be called the "Laseo-throwsers," as they are by Miss Buckley, the absurdity of the term becomes more than ever apparent. The action of the thread-cell, if employed to catch hold of an object, is rather that of a harpoon. Again, it would surely have been better to have spoken simply of the scorpion's "sting" rather than of its "poisoned dart." A dart is a weapon thrown from a distance, or, at all events, left sticking in the body of the victim, and the use of the term might lead to false impressions. These are, however, small matters, and, on the whole, we congratulate Miss Buckley most sincerely on her book, and recommend it as an excellent Christmas gift for all intelligent children. Many adults will also read it with advantage and instruction, and we are sure with pleasure.

A Smaller Manual of Modern Geography, Physical and Political. By John Richardson, M.A. (Murray.)

THIS is a condensation of the author's 'School Manual' intended for use in the junior classes. We dare say that many of our more conservative teachers of geography will find it a useful book, for it supplies them with a vast array of "facts," these facts for the most part consisting of mere names, which might far more advantageously be picked out on a map. The author claims credit for having unremittently striven after accuracy as to details. We regret not being able to state that he has been successful. Curiously turning over the pages of his volume, we find that in Belgium "many of the people speak Dutch, and many more German"; in Italy "about five millions of the people speak German, Albanian, or Greek"; that Saxony is no less famous for its wines than the Rhine and the Moselle; that Constance is the capital of the Thurgau, and Frankfurt of the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau. Bristol, we are told, ranks next to London and Liverpool as a port; and the "climate and productions of Rhenish Bavaria are similar to the climate and productions of Bavaria proper." The author appears to believe that Ofen and Buda are distinct towns. He calls Fort Garry the capital of Manitoba, tells us nothing about the railways of Algeria, and is frequently in error as regards area and population. His style (to our thinking a matter of some importance in a school-book) leaves much to be desired. Of Canada he says: "In 1871 the population was 3,670,577, consisting of French, Irish, English, Scotch, and other European nations." "The drainage of Canada belongs chiefly to the basins of the Arctic Ocean, Hudson Bay, the Atlantic Ocean, and the Pacific Ocean," which makes it appear as if some of the rivers found their way into the Indian or Antarctic Ocean. This looseness of style, superadded to palpably erroneous statements as to well-established facts, must greatly depreciate the value of this 'Manual' as a guide for teachers or pupils.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES

ADMIRAL A. P. RYDER, Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, recently offered to the Royal Geographical Society a sum of money for the foundation of three medals, to be annually awarded by the Council to such nautical geographers, including officers of the Royal Navy and Marines and mercantile marine, as should send in the best surveys, with sailing directions, meridian distances, meteorological observations, &c. He further expressed a wish that such medals should be named after a zealous surveyor, Commander Bird Allen, who died during the Niger expedition of 1840. We understand, however, that the Council of the Society, while fully appreciating the feelings which prompted Admiral Ryder's liberal offer, have thought it beyond their sphere of action to undertake the duty of awarding the medals.

M. Charles Wiener, who was recently appointed Vice-Consul for France at Guayaquil, was instructed to undertake certain explorations to ascertain the possibility of opening a commercial route to Quito by way of the Amazon and its affluent the Napo. Having accomplished his journey to Para, M. Wiener has addressed a report on his work to the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Paris, and he divides the information furnished into three parts: the study of the Rio Napo from a geographical point of view; the importance of such study from a commercial standpoint; and statistical data concerning commerce in the Amazon region and their relations to French trade and navigation. M. Wiener considers that he has settled the hydrology of the Rio Napo, having taken more than 2,000 soundings and numerous observations during his study of its course, and he says that vessels drawing about 6 ft. of water can ascend it to the mouth of its affluent the Mucuballi, which is below the rapids and 1,200 miles distant from the Atlantic. To this point he traced a practicable route from Quito, which he states is preferable to the one used by the missionaries on all grounds, and especially because the latter reaches the Napo above the rapids. M. Wiener reports that the missionaries, who are all-powerful in that part, did everything in their power to hinder his explorations, inducing the Indians to return into the forest, so that he might not obtain porters for his baggage.

From the December number of the Royal Geographical Society's Proceedings we learn that the Council have informed the Central Arctic Committee that Commander Cheyne's scheme of a North Pole expedition, as recently submitted to them, does not meet with their approval. The number also contains Mr. Joseph Thomson's account of the journey of the Society's East African expedition, illustrated by a map, and a paper by Capt. A. H. Markham, entitled 'A Visit to the Galapagos Islands in 1880.'

SOCIETIES.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Dec. 17.—R. Etheridge, Esq., President, in the chair.—Rev. A. Rose, Messrs. W. H. Bell, W. Jackson, P. P. Lawes, W. Libbey, jun., D. M. Llewellyn, J. Marshall, C. Parkinson, C. M. L. Percy, T. J. Robinson, B. Thompson, and K. G. Wardell were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On Remains of a small Lizard from the Neocomian Rocks of the Island of Lesina, Dalmatia, preserved in the Geological Museum of the University of Vienna,' by Prof. H. G. Seeley; and 'On the Beds at Haddon Hill and Colwell Bay in the Isle of Wight,' by Messrs. H. Keppel and E. B. Tawney.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Dec. 2.—H. Reeve, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. H. B. Milman expressed his regret that from causes beyond his control it had not been in his power to fulfil his engagement to lay before the Society this evening the Report of the Reading Visitation Committee.—Mrs. Hartshorne presented an autotype of a drawing made by herself in 1828 of the portrait of Queen Mary presented to the Society by her late father, the Rev. T. Kerrioh, Principal Librarian of the University of Cambridge.—Mr. E. Freshfield communicated a paper on the present condition of the Christian antiquities at Constantinople. The following is a list of the buildings to which Mr. Freshfield called special attention: The church of the monastery of the Studium; the church of the Lesser Santa Sophia; the church of Santa Sophia itself, where Mr. Freshfield discovered traces (which had hitherto escaped attention) of the Ikonostasis—an erection manifestly subsequent to the building of the edifice; the church of St. Irene; the church of the Monestechora; the church of the Kalender Hane Dgami, of a date very little posterior to the Emperor Justinian; the church of the Pantokrator; the church of the Budrum Dgami; the double church of the Fenare Jean Medjidi; the chapel of St. Nicholas; the church of the monastery of the Emaus; the church called Mustapha Pacha Dgami; the mosque of Mehmet Pacha. The whole paper afforded ample illustration of the words of the Psalmist, which Mr. Freshfield had inscribed on one of his photographs, "Thy Lord, the heathen have entered into Thine inheritance; Thy holy temples have they defiled." Mr. Freshfield also called attention to the condition and gradual destruction of the walls of Constantinople, a subject on which ten years ago (see Proceedings, vol. iv. p. 479) Lord Clarendon, at the instance of this Society, and upon information supplied by Mr. C. Trevelyan, had addressed urgent remonstrances to the Ottoman Porte, which for the time had arrested the hand of the destroyer. Mr. Freshfield, however, gave it as his opinion (subject to further inquiry, which he undertook to make at the request of the meeting and on behalf of the Society) that the ever-increasing demoralisation of the Turkish Government left little ground for hoping that similar remonstrances would now be productive of the slightest result. In the course of this paper, which was profusely illustrated by photographs of which Mr. Freshfield was the sole possessor, Mr. Freshfield called special attention to the vast and architecturally interesting water-cisterns which in many cases underlie the churches, and into some of which, through special facilities at his command, he had succeeded in penetrating. He also gave the results of a careful examination of masons' marks on the stones of Santa Sophia and other churches.

BRITISH ARCHEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—Dec. 1.—Mr. T. Morgan in the chair.—Mr. O. M. Hills exhibited a large collection of Romano-British fragments of pottery found at Manor Farm, Wanborough Plain, Wilts, where foundations of buildings have been met with, and others are believed to exist. Mr. Hills described the position on the line of the thirteenth iter of Antoninus, and suggested that it was the site of a lost Roman station, being where one may reasonably be supposed to exist in relation to Spine, the next one on the line of road.—Mr. Way exhibited some Roman coins recently found at Exeter.—Mr. Butcher produced a fragment of Roman Samian ware from the wall of London, now opened at the back of America Square, and the Chairman a perfect tile from the same place. It measures 17½ in. by 12½ in., and is 2½ in. thick.—Mr. L. Brock exhibited a drawing of the wall, and, after a description of the discovery, pointed out its resemblance to the wall in the Tower of London, which was then described in a short paper.—The Rev. Dr. Hoopell described at length the discoveries that have rewarded the exploration of the Roman station of Vinorium (Bischofer). This costly work has been undertaken by Mr. J. Froud, of Bishop's Auckland, under Dr. Hoopell's directions. The external walls have been traced, and found to be built on an earlier British wall. The plinth is chamfered similarly to the wall in America Square. A paved road, 30 ft. wide, extends through the station, and the walls of many private dwellings still remain, many of the doorways having bases of pillars in position. A large circular building was cleared out, and here and elsewhere the walls were found to be lined with hot-air flues of terra-cotta, kept in position by T-irons. Traces of reconstruction were found in every direction, and a mutilated statue of Flora was found serving as a support to some paving. The lecture was illustrated by a series of large coloured drawings, which gave a clear idea of these important and extensive discoveries. A large portion of the station remains to be opened out, although so much has been done.

ARCHEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—Dec. 2.—Rev. R. P. Coates in the chair.—The Chairman spoke of the loss that the Institute and historical archaeology had sustained by the death of Dr. Guest.—Mr. O. Morgan sent a paper on an inscribed centurial stone found last year on the shore of the Channel at Goldcliff, near Newport, Monmouthshire. After giving a very careful description of the district in the neighbourhood of the Goldcliff embankment and the object of this great work, Mr. Morgan spoke of certain vast floods which, in spite of it, had taken place, and particularly the great inundation of 1608, by which twenty-six parishes were submerged. He then dealt with the question as to who were the makers of the callum in question, noticing the different theories that had been brought forward in respect of it, and stating his conviction that it could be the work of no other people than the Romans, an opinion which had become fact by the discovery of this centurial stone. Mr. Morgan went at some length into the geological and manorial history of the district in describing the spot where the stone was found, and gave the translation of the inscription, which he had received from the Rev. C. W. King, showing that it recorded the construction of a certain number of thousand feet, apparently two Roman miles, of the callum by the soldiers of the first cohort of the centurion Statorius, and that the date was later than the Gordian epoch.—Sir J. Maclean sent some notes on the recent opening of a long barrow at Cranham in Gloucestershire.—Mr. M. H. Bloxam communicated a paper on a silver chalice and paten of the latter part of the fifteenth century, found at Hamstall Rudware, Staffordshire.—Mr. E. Walford gave an account of the discovery of a Roman altar and figures at York.—Mr. Morgan exhibited a rubbing of the Goldcliff stone.—Mr. Hartshorne sent a painting on glass, representing the joys of the Virgin, of the early part of the sixteenth century.—Mr. Hinks exhibited some very fine examples of Irish plate.—Capt. E. Hoare sent an Egyptian figure from Thebes in glazed earthenware, covered with hieroglyphics.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Nov. 30.—Dr. E. Hamilton, V.P., in the chair.—Papers and letters were read: by Mr. A. E. Craven, on a collection of land and fresh water shells from the Transvaal and Orange Free State in South Africa, with descriptions of nine new species, and on three new species of land shells from Cape Colony and Natal;—from Prof. A. A. W. Hubrecht, on a collection of Reptiles and Amphibians made by Dr. C. Duke in Beloochistan;—from Mr. J. H. Gurney, on the immature plumage of Dryocorymbus spectabilis (Schleg.), a very scarce rapacious bird from Gaboon, now living in the Society's collection;—from Mr. E. Trimen, on an undescribed Laniarius, obtained by Dr. E. F. Bradshaw on the Upper Limpopo, or Crocodile river, in Southern Africa, which he proposed to name Laniarius atrocroceus;—from Dr. G. Hartlaub, on five new birds that had been collected by Dr. Smith Bay in Central Africa: these were proposed to be called Tricholaema fasciata, Cisticola hyperantha, Eminia livida, Dryocichla incana, and Munipia insulata;—and by Mr. W. A. Forbes, on the external characters and anatomy of the Red Quakari Monkey (Brachyurus rubicundus), more particularly the liver and brain.

CHEMICAL.—Dec. 2.—Dr. Gilbert, V.P., in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On the Volumes of Sodium and Bromine at their Boiling Points,' by Mr. W. Ramsay;—'On the Volume of Phosphorus at its Boiling Point,' by Messrs. D. O. Mason and W. Ramsay. The authors have determined the atomic volume (the atomic volume—the specific volume \times atomic weight) of the following elements in the free state: bromine 27.133, sulphur 21.80, phosphorus 20.91, sodium 31.00. The authors discuss the formulae of oxytrichloride of phosphorus, and conclude that in that substance phosphorus is a pentad, and that the constitution of that substance is $O=P_2Cl_5$. The atomic volume of phosphorus in this compound is therefore 21.1.—'On the Specific Volume of Chloral,' by Laura Maude Passavant. Great care was taken in purifying the chloral; the specific volume, determined according to the method of Thorpe, was found to be 107.37.—'Note on the Formation of 'Carbon Tetrabromide in the Manufacture of Bromine,' by Mr. J. C. Hamilton. A quantity of a white crystalline substance was obtained as a residue after distilling a quantity of commercial bromine; it melted at 80°, and contained 97 per cent. of bromine.—'Researches on the Relation between the Molecular Structure of Carbon Compounds and their Absorption Spectra,' by Mr. W. N. Hartley. Part 1. General conclusions as to the nature of actinic absorption exerted by various carbon compounds. Part 2. Experiments which prove the diastinct character of substances constructed on an open chain of carbon compounds. Part 3. The actinic absorption exerted by various closed chains of carbon atoms. Part 4. The absorption spectra of condensed benzenic nuclei. Part 5. The cause of absorption bands in the spectra transmitted by benzene and its derivatives.

PHILOLOGICAL.—Dec. 3.—A. J. Ellis, Esq., President, in the chair.—The President paid a tribute to the memory of the late Dr. E. Guest, first honorary secretary, and for years a vice-president of the Society.—Prince L. L. Bonaparte read a paper 'On Neuter Neo-Latin Substantives.' He showed by exhaustive lists that the Italian language and dialects alone pre-same may be said of the larger designs. On the whole, indeed, these impressions are brighter than those in the magazine. Of the invention or designing it is no mean praise to say that it suits the text as perfectly as that of Cruikshank's "cuts" suit 'Oliver Twist,' and other books on which that incomparable illustrator employed his genius. 'Romola' and Sir F. Leighton's designs are in such perfect harmony that our ideas of the novel may be said to crystallize round the illustrations. This is as it should be. The only difference between the two is that the designs are even more "Italian" than the romance, and truer in their local colouring, while they are as rich in incident and as severe. We need but remind readers of the 'Supper in the Rucellai Gardens,' a true and elegant piece of old Florence; 'Teens at Home' is most charming; 'Going Home,' where Tito returns to Romola, expresses exactly what there is in the text, using, so to say, the choicest Tuscan—that is, "picked touches, every line,"—that art of this kind can employ.

Drifting, by T. B. Read, published by Messrs. Sonnenschein & Allen, is remarkable for its beautiful cover of greyish gold—i.e., Dutch metal, adapted with sundry improvements from the 'Salon Illustré' of 1879—and flowers stamped in black, gold, and silver. The illustrative designs are by Miss L. B. Humphrey, and are all distinguished by good taste, genuine feeling for the pathos of the text and of nature, and skill in drawing.

The Eve of St. Agnes, by John Keats, illustrated in nineteen etchings by C. O. Murray (Rampson Low & Co.), is handsomely printed on fine paper, and is enriched with many neat and some poetical etchings of a somewhat amateurish, that is to say, immature cast, by a draughtsman who has not training enough to express himself in a manner altogether satisfactory. This is proved by a drawing of a corbel on the title-page. The subject is excellent and even admirable, for it is derived naturally from the poem, and the design is sympathetically conceived. But the student's pleasure is instantly marred when he sees that one wing of the sculptured cherub is out of drawing, out of proportion, out of perspective, and out of keeping with its fellow. On the other hand, this "carved angel," "eager eyed," that thus stares at the ominous festival of St. Agnes, is introduced with rare taste and taste, although the base of the respond which its head sustains is as ill drawn as the moulded cap of the corbel itself or the wing before mentioned. The owl crouching in the cold church tower among the ivy, the moonlit fold among barren hills, the march of trumpeters, and half-a-dozen more vignettes, have a gracefulness which sometimes is charming. The more ambitious groups of figures, which are essentially dramatic illustrations of the work, are not equal to the subjects they represent. It must be admitted that so much first-rate art has been employed on 'The Eve of St. Agnes,' that it would be difficult to satisfy the public with new attempts which do not at least aim at new achievements.

NEW PRINTS AND ENGRAVINGS.

Messrs. THOMAS AGNEW & SONS have sent us an engraver's proof of M. Waltner's plate reproducing Mr. Millais's picture called 'The Widow's Mite,' being the companion to 'The Gambler's Wife,' which we recently noticed. A tall and handsome lady in reduced circumstances is putting her mite into the box of a charitable institution. She carries a milliner's box on one arm, and looks from the picture with an expression the pathos of which made the painting very popular. We prefer the sentiment, and even the execution, as well as the engraving, of the companion work. The original of 'The Gambler's Wife' lent itself more completely to the process of etching. The face of the widow, though more beautiful, has not so much character, and it is not so intensely biographical as that of the wife, nor is the action so dramatic nor the attitude so natural. On the other hand, though the new plate suffers by comparison with its companion, there is no lack of merit in it, except it be that the black skirt is not quite differently dark enough from the background and its shadow, with which, in the chiaroscuro of this design, they are associated. The slightly fallen contours of the bust are true to nature, so is the reduced plumpness of the face. The features, serious and pathetic as they are, are beautifully drawn and modelled; the very poise of the head, the neatness of the white cap and black bonnet, its floating veil, and the carefully arranged hair are signs of suppressed coquetry proper to the subject. The brilliancy of the "colour" throughout, but especially of the box, gloves, and bust, is first-rate.

Messrs. Agnew & Sons have also published two prints, artists' proofs of which lie before us, from pictures by Mr. B. Riviere, the one engraved in mezzotint by Mr. S. Cosma, the other produced by the same process by Mr. F. Staepoole. The former shows a pretty little girl standing by a window, in snowy weather, and depressed by the dreariness of the season, her own troubles being suggested by her costume; a large deerhound, the chef-d'œuvre of the design, stands by the child, and fondly sympathizes with her emotions. It is pretty and sentimental; the face of the child and her air and expression are in complete accord with the suggestions of the subject and the title, which is 'Imprisoned.' The other print reproduces a painting called 'Persepolis,' which our readers will remember to have seen at the Royal Academy, representing lions and horsemen roaming by moonlight in the empty, roofless halls of the palace in the imperial city, long after Alexander burned it. The print fully and successfully translates the sentiment of the original, which, though melo-dramatic, is poetical in its way. But, artistically speaking, it does not by any means exhaust the finer technical qualities of the picture, in which, it is true, there was a large proportion of spaces which were somewhat "empty" of form and varieties of tone and colour. For examples, the painted sky by no means "throbbled" with rich varieties of tone or tint, although it was not in this respect nearly so mechanical as a David Roberts; the broad shadows of the architecture were dignified and expressive, but, if they lacked anything, it was variety of tones and tints, diversified incidents and play of illumination. These elements are in the print all but quite empty and flat.

Mr. W. A. Smith, of 14, Charles Street, Middlesex Hospital, has published a folio containing six etchings, called 'London Thoroughfares,' representing interesting localities in the metropolis. Most of these views have been exhibited in London; some of them have already been admired in these columns as the works of Mr. Charles J. Watson. The forebotten view of one of the fronts of London Bridge, with a great shadow in the foreground, could hardly be better drawn or treated more happily, but we feel that the distant buildings are too conspicuous. 'Temple Bar' is a first-rate piece of effect and colour, given with good draughtsmanship, so that the building is quite solid and very rich in tone. Grimy, but picturesque, extraordinarily wealthy in "colour" and incidental play of light and shadow, local colour and varied lines, and finely delineated is the 'Entrance to Clare Market.' Nor is 'Holywell Street' inferior, to the only speaking. 'Trafalgar Square' could hardly be better than it is. We hope Mr. Watson may be encouraged to continue the production of these excellent works of art.

'LA VIERGE AUX ROCHERS.'

MR. BURTON's tenure of office in the National Gallery has again been signalized by the acquisition of a famous and beautiful picture, one of those which every student would covet for the English collection. It is the large Leonardo da Vinci known as 'La Vierge aux Rochers,' which was lent by the late possessor, the Earl of Suffolk, to the Royal Academicians in 1870, when it was No. 6, and hung in Gallery No. I. at Burlington House. It is well known that there are two versions of the design: that which is now in the National Gallery, waiting to take a place on a wall in one of the public rooms, and that other which is in the Long Gallery of the Louvre, and belonged to Francis I. Desnoyers engraved and Bodmer lithographed the latter version; and Desnoyers's print is a masterpiece. It has been much disputed which is the superior picture; there is a preponderance of opinion in favour of the former, a judgment in which, having carefully examined both, we are able to concur. To take the highest element of the painting, the faces are better in the work from Charlton Park, and the drawing throughout is better. Dr. Waagen, however, was probably right in recognizing the hand of a pupil in much of the background, and the picture has gained nothing from a flood of brown varnish, which might, we suppose, be safely removed. Lomazzo, who, within seventy years of Leonardo's death, saw the painting in the Capella della Concezione in the church of St. Francesco at Milan, described it as the work of Da Vinci, and by the name of the 'Concezione.' In 1796 Mr. Gavin Hamilton bought it out of the chapel for thirty ducats, and some time afterwards sold it to the Earl of Suffolk for a much larger sum. We believe the nation has paid 9,000*l.*, a price which is decidedly below the value of this important work. It was at the British Institution in 1851, and again in 1856. In Mr. Holford's collection is a head of the Virgin painted in brown, and so closely resembling that in this picture as to justify the idea that it is the study for the principal portion. The head was No. 144 of the Manchester Art Treasures. 'La Vierge aux Rochers' is supposed to have been executed in 1483. Two angels at the side are represented in the Melzi Collection at Milan. There are several copies in public museums, e.g., at Nantes. There are drawings in the gallery at Turin and at Windsor Castle which evidently refer to this picture, and exhibit some variations in the design. Nagler, 'Kunstler-Lexicon,' xx. 320, says that other drawings of this order, executed in black chalk on blue paper, are at Chatsworth.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—WINTER EXHIBITION.

THIS collection of "sketches and studies" is of average merit, and while some young contributors who have been recently elected have done much to secure the success of the exhibition, on the other hand a few of the better-known artists are not represented. The pictures of absentees like Messrs. Alma Tadema, Boyce, A. W. and W. H. Hunt, and H. C. White would alone suffice to make an exhibition. We shall take the examples in their order on the walls, after grouping each artist's works. The collection of drawings by the late Mr. Dodgson is extremely interesting, but by no means exhaustive.

Mr. W. Eyre Walker is a new-comer who is welcome. His merits will be recognized in the bright and pleasant sketch called Beeches—October (No. 3), a sunlit and chequered slope of woodland. The clear and solid draughtsmanship, the firm outlining of the trees, and the faithful beauty of their local colouring are great charms. His On the North Devon Coast (395), a little woody and sandy nook, is first-rate; an excellent study of a lovely place we like too well to name.—A Sunflower (?), by Mr. E. K. Johnson, is one of a class of drawings that show creditable care; but they are not interesting nor spontaneous nor beautiful. A young girl in a well-painted white muslin dress stands before a lofty sunflower, and brings its huge yellow disc down to her face. Her expression is not animated enough to tell us why she does this. The execution is broad and agreeable, and not without vigour, and the flowers are capably drawn; but when this is said the merits of the picture have been told. Lilium Auratum (65) is by the same artist; it is of the same class, and has similar merits and shortcomings. The artist's affection for red-brick walls has been repeatedly shown in such pictures as A Rustic Scene (14), which gives us a wayside cottage, with rather awkwardly grouped figures of children, all painted without care for harmony of colour, and with some excess of hardness. The tones are crude. The poultry are capably executed, but they are not well placed on their feet.—Mr. O. W. Brierly has found a new subject for his skill in representing the hurried movements of craft during an Autumn Squall in the Lagoon at Venice (22), which, although not unmarked by the lamp, is animated enough, thanks to the fluttering of the richly painted sails of the barges. The water is mechanical and artificial in modelling and colour.—Mr. T. Danby sends several of his scholastic landscapes of romantic subjects, in which the scenic elements overpower those which are merely natural, without, however, imparting pathos to them or proving spontaneity. In Looking down the River Sarine (29) we have a pretty vista of a shallow valley. In spite of the mannerisms of the work, the tender grace of the mid-distance and the distance is enjoyable. The foreground lacks solidity, and has the look of manufacture. The close likeness between this picture and such works as The Banks of the Earn (12) and On the Welsh Coast (93), which differ only in their outlines, shows how uniform is the impression made by nature on the mind of the painter, whose very skill is against him, for it is facile and cultivated, but not inspired. Mr. Danby does everything equally well, so that we have no sympathy with him.

The difference between style and manner may be appreciated at once by the visitor who will turn from Mr. Danby's works to the contributions of Mr. A. D. Fripp. Although they do not differ from each other more than Mr. Danby's do, yet they are all marked by individuality, and there is more in them than mere variety of subject. The Beach at Lulworth (30) is a beautiful study of the opalescent hues of a vapour-charged atmosphere when suffused by sunlight and unmoved by the wind. Unfinished as it is, it renders the air and distance with an irresistible charm; the boats and lofty half-shrouded promontory of chalk, the grayish verdure, and the calm sea occur in reposeful harmonies of tones and tints. For similar qualities and similar characteristics, and an almost identical effect, see The "Constance" Beached, Lulworth, (225) and The Ship, Lulworth (408), where a capital subject has been headfully studied.

From these serene, idyllic glimpses of nature, which in their refined simplicity are classical, we may turn, not without profit and instruction, to the clear, precisely defined, and extremely humorous study—no mere sketch, but a learned and solid piece of workmanship, as firm as it is faithful, like a vigorous piece of humorous prose—which represents young penguins, and which Mr. Marks calls The Two Dromiuses (35), while he puts into the mouth of one of them the saying,

Methinks you are my glass,
And not my brother.

The penguin babies are toddling along a pavement in the odd, sidelong fashion of their kind, the one after the other. They are not quite alike; in the difference between them lies the humour of the subject, to say nothing of the grotesqueness of their expression, the uncouthness of their attitudes, the ungainliness of their gait, if gait that can be called which consists of lurches like those of a compass over a sheet of paper. The verisimilitude of the plumage is to be admired not less than the clearness of the local colour of the same. In the simple gravity of the colour and breadth of effect of the little landscape which Mr. Marks has named A Suffolk Road (308) is to be found a pathos equal to the humour of his 'Dromiuses.' His Southwold Mill (392) is sober, solemn in its simplicity, and perfectly serene.—These pictures, sincere and spontaneous as they are, afford contrast to Mr. G. H. Andrews's Moonlight on the Rotter (39), which, although redolent of the lamp, must not be overlooked. Its whitish-grey clouds, its turquoise sky, and its vaporous mid-distance are almost charming. But the light on our right is too common an element to be worthy of the rest of the picture, and, considering the local colour of the moon's lustre, it is of too red a redness.—A little hard and dry, the manipulation of Mr. O. Weber's English Cart-Horses (42) brings us back to the verisimilitude of Mr. Marks's art, which it resembles in solidity of modelling and textural imitation. The grouping, however, is commonplace, and the foreshortening is incorrect.

In Mr. Albert Goodwin's Salisbury (43) there is a white stone bridge of most exquisite tints and tone, most admirably drawn, and altogether wrought with so much spontaneity that its local truth is noble. We cannot say much for the sky, but the houses are worthy of the bridge. In his Townstock (56) a wan gleam of day is departing from off the church and town, while the very ghost of a moon grows radiant wherever the clouds allow her light to escape. The whole is beautiful in keeping. The English Cemetery at Rome (240) shows resplendent concentric cirri over the dark, gaunt cypresses and many tombs of that famous place, and is a thorough picture. Sandsend, Yorkshire, (330) is a grave and dignified study of twilight on shore and sea.—Of Mr. J. W. North's pictures, Autumn (72) is the best. An Algerian landscape, it renders faithfully and yet delicately the effect of a dream-like light over a pool, water meadows, trees, and dying flowers, with a sky of the warmest grey. No. 81, Pond by the Desert, by the same artist, is marred by the too common defect of work such as this, excessive alightness and a weak, indecisive touch, which is almost tricky.—Durham from the River-Side (90), by Mr. Lockhart, is extremely enjoyable on account of the skill and brilliancy displayed in painting the real bridge over, and the bridge reflected by the surface of, the Wear. The composition of the whole suggests the idea that the picture might be advantageously cut in half.

Aquila and Pricilla (94) is a cartoon made for a stained-glass window to be placed in the chapel at Eaton Hall, one of a series of fine decorative designs by Mr. Shields, which we have already described. Its grand style claims the reader's admiration.—Launching a Yarmouth House-Boat (109) is the first of the works of Mr. H. Moore which deserve attention. It is remarkable for the sympathetic way in which the tremendous grandeur of great masses of cumuli has been painted, the skill and learning displayed in the flying veils of rain, lustre, and shadow which occur between the clouds and the tumultuous waves beneath them. The handling is rough. Let the reader notice the clever painting of the Study of Grey Horses (146), and by no means let him omit to look at the novel tragedy which is represented in The Last Berth (157), a picture of a smack which has gone ashore, and now, heeling with decks open to the sea, lies battered on the beach. The drawing of the hull, the strength and richness of the local colour, the modelling of the waves and the wreck itself are unsurpassed by anything in the room. We think the shadows on the hull are too black for daylight. The work is rather hard. Glen Durrer (356) is intensely brilliant and effective as a study of deep and lustrous blue water, with whitish ashy hills behind. The drawing of the masses of clouds and mountains in the vista beyond the lake is highly artistic.—In the perfect calm of the river in At Hurley (135) Mr. C. Davidson has been fortunate.

The late Mr. Dodgson's numerous drawings have given a special character to this exhibition, but it is not incumbent on us to do more than record our admiration of their vigorous and yet delicate style, the brilliancy of the illumination, the richness of their local colouring, their perfect keeping, their almost classic taste, their prevailing and characteristic silveriness, and their pure execution, which, with their breadth and keeping, reminds us of frescoes. We notice as new to us A Bit of the Mumbles (136), a panorama from the cliffs, including a darkish wan sea of yeasty waves breaking on a low, rocky, russet and green promontory. This is in the painter's recent manner. Not so the two fine and precise architectural studies, which were made in the early days of the artist for Prof. Cookerell. These are Bow Church (453) and St. Bride's Church (459). Among the recent drawings let us name On the Yorkshire Coast (424), The Morning after the Wreck (427), A Summer Morning on the Ilyn (435), and Crawley Wood and Oxwich Castle (441).

Mr. E. Waterlow's White Clover and Poppin (153) is an artist-like and broad picture of a field clad in white, red, and green herbage, sloping upwards and clad at the summit with trees. The outlines are firm, the atmosphere is good.—Sir J. Gilbert's Battle of the Standard (183) has the dramatic qualities that distinguish his dashing compositions, but it is unusually confused and forced in colour and effect and terribly mannered.—Mr. G. Fripp's Study in a Backwater on the Thames (186) exhibits low tones and colour, and very delicate foreshortening of the grey river's surface in the vista of a creek.—Monte Salvatore, Lugano (199), by Mr. W. M. Hale, has a fine subject in the pyramidal rock standing on a promontory of the lake, on the surface of which the reflection of the hill is beautifully depicted.—Mrs. Angell's Spring Gatherings (213), apple-blossoms in a jar, are brilliant, solid, pure, and lustrous, but they have not been composed with art, so as to make a picture proper. Her Aryanthemums (247) is better pictorially, an elaborate study of yellow and white flowers. Foreign Birds (318) are intensely brilliant, magical in respect to the vivid blue and green colours of their plumage. Like the flowers, the study has too much of "still life."—Mr. T. J. Watson's In a Wood (217) is a masculine, well-drawn picture of beeches and dry herbage in a darkling thicket. Able as it is, we fancy much of it was done at home.—Among the pretty drawings here let us note Mr. B. Foster's On Hambleton Common (234).

Mr. Wallis has contributed an interesting study of colour and effect called In the Uffizi Gallery (237), where the warm and semi-lustrous white of an antique statue in full light contrasts with the almost dusky shadows and deep coolness of the wall. The contrast may be a little too positive for harmony in composition, but it is curious and fine, the local colouring is rich and broad, the picture luminous. By the same is A Study (258), a noble drawing in black and white chalks on blue paper, showing trees lying prostrate in a gloomy wood at evening after a storm, with glare between the distant trunks. The Marriage Settlement (381) comprises a somewhat uninteresting group of figures, clad in costumes of the eighteenth century, brilliantly and purely coloured, and exceptionally rich in tone. The deep blue of the lady's dress is as beautiful as the rosy hue of that of the bridegroom. No. 404, A Manuscript, a study of the interior of a room, is very delicate in colour and firm in painting.—Mr. T. J. Watson's powerful Sketch on the South Coast (269) represents an old mill, at gloomy evening, on the margin of the sea.—Mr. F. Powell's Beachland (316) depicts a yawl drawing on a calm sea, half shrouded in opalescent mist of most delicate colour. Such art as Mr. Powell's can hardly be mannered, but he repeats his subjects, which is not desirable. — Mrs. Allingham is a liberal contributor; her dozen drawings are all and each of them charming, but their claims on our admiration are unequal. It might have been well to send fewer. Of the most attractive the following may be named: Resting (320), a perfect study of nature, beautifully drawn, and solid to a marvel; the subject is a wood with pretty figures. The Letter (334), a damsel in white, in a meadow, near trees, is quite equal to the last, but not so pleasing. Milly (338) is a deliciously fresh and sweet drawing of a little girl in a white hood; the pure expression of her face is charming. Mrs. Allingham's work is always remarkable for its "wholesomeness": here is this characteristic in perfection. We heartily enjoy Driving to Market (375), children with a barrow, a fine silvery picture. — These fresh English idyls assort themselves well with the solemn and profoundly pathetic "Dorian" mood of Mr. Samuel Palmer's grave morning scene, the subject of his Aurora (323), in which he has painted the fine romantic theme of an etching lately published by the Fine-Art Society under the title of 'Opening the Fold.' The morning sends long rays of ruddy lustre towards the zenith from behind isolated mountains, which on the horizon seem to guard a plain, where a river flows in a ravine. Twilight breaks the shadows of the night on the wooded banks, while the dawn strikes the backs of sheep which issue from a fold while a shepherd pipes to them, and the radiance veils the stars. So much for the sentiment of the design. Technically speaking, Mr. Palmer never surpassed this work in respect to the treatment of the atmosphere, the richness and deep softness of the shadows, the breadth of the effect, the splendour of the light. — Mr. G. A. Fripp is quite himself in reproducing the pearl-lustre of an English atmosphere in his Hayfield Study (345), a summer picture. His Hayfield Sketch (190) matches the last in nearly all respects of quality and merit. His study of a calm, rosy evening, called On the Banks of the Thames (358), is sober and tender. — Mr. Britton Willis's Evening on the Essex Marshes (368) has the force and many more of the qualities of oil painting. His Gloom of Evening Sunshine (397), a girl trudging after cows, is noteworthy for solidity, brightness, and care.

Fine-Art Society.

THE first results of admitting the public to the National Gallery during students' days took the form of one hundred and fifty-four shillings on the first day last week, and one hundred and fifty-seven shillings on the second day. No inconvenience was experienced by anybody in the Gallery in consequence of these admissions.

THE vacant galleries of the British Museum are being gradually replenished. Dr. Birch's Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities, which is to occupy part of the space lately tenanted by the palaeontological collections, has just begun to transfer its archives; and Mr. Newton is getting ready a room which will be entirely devoted to the display of Etruscan sculpture and other examples of the fine arts.

THE Burlington Club proposes to arrange that its next exhibition of works of art shall consist of a representative collection of choice mezzotints, chosen and arranged so as to afford means of studying the rise and progress of this mode of engraving from the earliest examples to those of the culmination of the art, both here and abroad.

At a meeting of the Provisional Council of the Society of Painter-Etchers, held on November 29th, a resolution was passed to the following effect:—"That, with a view to obtain an adequate representation of the art of original engraving in all its forms (painter-etching), as well as to provide a constituency out of which to elect the first Fellows of this Society, an exhibition, as comprehensive as possible of the works of the best living etchers, be opened in London not later than the first Monday in April, 1881, and that negotiations for the use of a gallery for the purpose of such an exhibition be entered upon by the Provisional Council." It will be perceived by this resolution that the contemplated display is not merely to demonstrate the status of painter-etching as it exists, but to furnish a test by which a conclusion may be arrived at as to the material existing for the personnel of such a society as has been proposed. The exhibition will be looked forward to, therefore, with peculiar interest—an interest which will be increased by the fact that several eminent painters who have not yet essayed the use of the etching needle have promised to contribute to it.

THE picture called 'The Vision of Ezekiel,' bequeathed to the nation by Mr. P. F. Poole, has been hung in a good place in the National Gallery, where considerable improvements have lately been effected in the arrangement of examples of the English school. By careful hanging and the removal of a few of the less important paintings to the stairs and the vestibule, the whole of the small room at the top of the entrance staircase has been cleared, and awaits further improvements and the introduction of new acquisitions, such as those early Flemish examples which were lately obtained, to say nothing of other works which Mr. Burton's good fortune may secure during that journey in Italy which has now nearly come to its end.

THE current obituary records the death, on the 28th ult., at the age of eighty-nine years, of Mr. Charles Sackville Bole, the distinguished collector of works of art and antiquities, a liberal lender of his acquisitions for public enjoyment, a man of considerable acquirements and a fine and curious taste. He long ago declared his wish that after his death his collections should be sold.

THE church at Ecombe, in the county of Durham, recently identified as Saxon, has just been repaired, let us hope judiciously, and its decay arrested. Several Roman inscribed stone slabs have been found enclosed in the outer wall by the builders, who appear to have drawn extensively upon the neighbouring Roman town.

SOME frescoes of the school of Raphael are said to have been discovered behind the apse of the church of St. Rocco and Sta. Maria del Vivario in Frascati.

THE annual general meeting of the Glasgow Archaeological Society was held last week. The annual report was read and approved, and the office-bearers elected for the ensuing year. Mr. William George Black was elected Honorary Executive Secretary, in place of Mr. J. D. Duncan. A paper was read by Mr. St. John V. Day, F.R.S.E.

MR. WALFORD intends to start in January a new magazine, called the Antiquarian Magazine. The Antiquary will, we are told, in future be conducted by two Fellows of the Society of Antiquaries.

THE forthcoming Journal of the British Archaeological Association will contain, among other papers, the following:—"Rotherham and its Ecclesiastical and Collegiate Buildings," by the late J. Guest, F.S.A.; "Terra-Cotta Tablets of Babylonia and Assyria," by T. G. Pinches; "St. Andrew's Church, Norwich," by F. R. Becheno; "The Trinitarian Arrangement of part of Norwich Cathedral," by Rev. J. Gunn; "Cup-markings on Burley Moor," by C. W. Dymond; "Ancient Coins of Norwich," by H. W. Henfrey; "A Portrait of King Henry VI. in Eye Church, Suffolk," by H. S. Cumming; and "A Résumé of the Devises Congress," by T. Morgan, F.S.A.

THE Cabinet des Estampes, Paris, has lately bought a collection of all the states of all the plates produced by the late Jules Jacquemart, comprising 1,500 pieces in all, and contained in fifteen portfolios. The family of the artist generously accepted for this collection a price which is said to be considerably below its commercial value.

M. P. BAUDRY has been commissioned to execute a series of decorative panels in the Château de Chantilly for the Duc d'Anjou.

THE famous Château of Blois is undergoing important restorations at the hands of M. de Baudot, the architect who was formerly employed to execute similar works on the church of St. Laumer at Blois. The upper portions of the buildings of Francis I., roofs, chimneys, and dormers, which are much decayed, are selected for repair.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Sacred Harmonic Society.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Goetz's Symphony.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Mr. Cowen's Orchestral Concerts.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society may be said to have made, on the whole, an auspicious commencement of their first season at St. James's Hall. It was a matter of some interest to learn whether the necessary reductions in the chorus would result in the retention of a force competent to give effect to the grandest choral works. Of that, happily, no doubt need any longer exist. As the works performed on Friday week were not so familiar as some in the Society's repertoire, the choral force was put fairly to the test, and it issued from the ordeal well nigh scathless. Mendelssohn's 'Christus' is so seldom heard in public that comparisons are scarcely possible; but regarding the same composer's 'Lauda Sion' and Beethoven's Mass in c, it may be said with safety that no recent performance of either work at Exeter Hall gave such satisfaction as that of last week. The voices proved fresh and powerful and the attack was generally good. In a well-known chromatic passage in the Sanctus of the Mass the intonation was bad, but, speaking generally, the singing was worthy of considerable praise. The executants still number nearly 300, the exact proportions being 55 sopranos, 55 altos, 45 tenors, and 45 basses, with an orchestra of 72. This is a force sufficiently large to give due effect to any works, with the exception, perhaps, of those oratorios of Handel which contain double choruses. If considered advisable, special performances of these might be given from time to time at the Albert Hall, the usual chorus being reinforced from the ranks of the Handel Festival Choir. There was little for the principal vocalists to accomplish in the works performed on Friday. Mrs. Osgood was warmly and deservedly applauded for a very artistic rendering of the air "Lord at all times" in 'Lauda Sion,' and she was efficiently supported by Miss M. Hancock, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. F. King.

The only symphony composed by the late Hermann Goetz formed the special attraction of last Saturday's concert at the Crystal Palace. We have more than once recently had occasion to speak of the undoubted genius of the young composer; in none of his works are the peculiar characteristics and excellences of his style more clearly observable than in the Symphony in c. For a first hearing of the work London amateurs are indebted to Mr. Weist Hill, who, in December, 1878, included it in the programme of one of Madame Viard-Louis's concerts at St. James's Hall. It was given at the Crystal Palace on the 5th of April, 1879, and the performance of Saturday last was the second at these concerts.

From the lines of Schiller,—

In des Herzens heilig stille Räume
Musst du fischen aus des Lebens Drang.

prefixed as a motto to the score, it may be anticipated that the general style of Goetz's symphony is meditative and reflective; and such we find to be the case. The bias of the composer's genius was towards the dreamy and imaginative rather than in the direction of the vigorous and passionate; and though it is true that in some parts of his music—for instance, in the finale of the present work, and in certain scenes in the 'Taming of the Shrew'—we find abundance of energy and life, yet such passages are comparatively so rare that they may almost be called exceptional. The quiet emotions of the heart were evidently more congenial subjects for Goetz's muse than the storm and stress of life. The opening allegro of the symphony has some affinity of character with the first movement of his pianoforte concerto recently noticed by us; there is the same poetical charm and freshness of idea, the same mastery of the technique of composition, the same sweet and rich (though seldom brilliant) orchestral colour. The intermezzo which forms the second movement is one of the most delightful pieces which Goetz has written. Its themes are specially attractive, and its instrumentation most felicitous. The adagio is pervaded by a feeling of deep melancholy, relieved by an occasional gleam of sunshine, as at the entry of the horns in the episode in c major; the whole movement is full of poetry, but somewhat diffuse. The finale, overflowing with life and spirit, is but little inferior in charm to the allegretto, while for sustained power and masterly workmanship we consider it the finest portion of the symphony. The whole work was magnificently played under Mr. Manne's direction, and enthusiastically received. The only other item of the concert to which it is needful to advert was Chopin's Fantasia on Polish Airs for piano and orchestra, which was given for the first time at these concerts. This very little known composition is founded on three national melodies, two of which are peculiarly quaint and characteristic; the pianoforte part, which is excessively difficult, abounds in those passages of elaborate embroidery to which Chopin was so partial. Of instrumentation the composer unfortunately knew very little; and here, as in his concertos, he has frequently blurred the outlines of his work by the very injudicious way in which he has accompanied the piano by the orchestra. In spite of this drawback, the composition is very charming and well deserved a hearing. Miss Janotha's rendering of the solo part can hardly be over-praised—it was magnificent. The fair pianist is always heard at her best in the music of her compatriot, and she has never played more finely than on Saturday.

The third of Mr. F. H. Cowen's orchestral concerts, which took place last Saturday evening, was even more interesting than either of those which preceded it, and the programme was admirably arranged, its only fault being a superabundance of material. Contrary to rule at orchestral concerts, a very small proportion consisted of works familiar to musicians. Indeed, the only item which may be so considered was Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in a flat, which was played with much spirit, though with a deficiency of refinement. Taking the order of the programme, Mr. Harold Thomas's overture, 'Mountain, Lake, and Moorland,' came next, and the favourable impression made by the work at the initial performance last February, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, was fully confirmed. The overture contains some charming ideas, which, despite their imperfect treatment, afford circumstantial evidence that if the composer had persevered with orchestral writing he might have made a high reputation. The first actual novelty was a Pianoforte Concerto in d by Mozart. It has been remarked that the reputation of Mozart, especially in this country, rests upon a very small proportion of his voluminous compositions. This may be said with emphasis of his pianoforte concertos, of which there are about twenty-six of undoubted authenticity. With the exception of the one in d minor, they may be said to form a terra incognita to the framers of concert programmes. The Concerto in d is one of six written in 1784, when Mozart was busy concert-giving in Vienna. Like its companions, it is in the customary three movements, each in regular form, and, though by no means a striking work, contains enough of beauty to amply justify its introduction to the London public. It was interpreted in a fairly creditable manner by Miss Bessie Richards. The next instrumental piece was the Bacchanale from the first act of 'Tannhäuser.' In speaking of this as a "newly-composed scene," the writer of the analytical programme may have unwittingly misled some among the audience. It was composed in 1862, when Wagner's opera was performed at the Paris Académie Royale, and is merely an amplification of the original first scene, necessitated by the rules of the French establishment. With the scenic accessories the effect would doubtless be very striking, but the music is ill suited to the concert room, especially the first portion accompanying the demoniac orgies of the Bacchantes. Further, it cannot be said that Mr. Cowen's orchestra was altogether at its best in the performance; but, despite these drawbacks, the piece was received with loud applause. Perhaps the most important novelty of the evening was Mr. A. H. Jackson's Concerto in a for violin. The composer, who was formerly a student at the Royal Academy of Music, is already favourably known by some promising works, especially a pianoforte concerto which was introduced at a Philharmonic Concert last season. The ideas in this were of considerable beauty, and in the violin concerto they are certainly less attractive; but the later work shows breadth and vigour in construction, the subjects being treated with much skill and elaboration, even to the verge of labour. The work must be heard a second time in order to gauge its precise value, but even at the lowest estimate it is one of the most important compositions of its class presented to our notice for some time. The vocal music was contributed by Miss Mary Davies and Miss Orridge, the most interesting selection being a solo, "Fac me vere," from Haydn's 'Stabat Mater,' sung by the last-named lady. But Miss Orridge should endeavour to check a growing and painful defect in production, which threatens to mar the prospect at one time apparently open to her of obtaining eminence as a contralto of the first rank. Mr. Cowen's last concert of the present series will take place next Saturday, when the programme will include his new Symphony, No. 3, in c minor; an overture, 'Titania,' by Mr. H. C. Nixon; a tone picture, 'The Ebbing Tide,' by Mr. J. F. Barnett; and a triple concerto for pianoforte, violin, and flute, by Bach, all for the first time.

NOTES FROM VIENNA.

Nov. 27, 1880.

TALK to almost any Englishman of music in Vienna, and he is certain to respond with some cherished reminiscence of the strains of Strauss's band, the single musical impression the majority of our countrymen carry away with them from the Austrian capital—the single one they ever seek there, as something peculiarly local and characteristic of the place and people. So, no doubt, it is. An ideal of dance music, if we may say so, has here been created and realized. Flimsy though it may be, an element of poetry has been breathed into it, and these "People's Concerts" at Vienna serve a purpose beyond that of tickling the ears of idlers. They form a sort of musical "Kindergarten" for those whose musical faculties are dull or undeveloped, and may impart a taste that will seek better cultivation. Still they must rank lowest in the scale of musical enjoyments in a city which abounds in others of a higher order. For instance, nowhere in Germany, which is as much as to say nowhere in the world, can musical services be heard in greater perfection than at the Chapel of the Imperial Palace, to which the public are freely admitted. A small orchestra—but sufficient for the limited size of the building—and a picked choir, give here on Sundays and festivals performances of an excellence it would be difficult to overrate. On the last two occasions, respectively, we have heard Beethoven's Missa in c and Schubert's in a flat rendered with astonishing precision, finish, and refinement of expression. At many other of the leading places of worship the church music is most admirable, many eminent singers, male and female, assisting in the choirs, but the ensemble at the Burg Kapelle, where the soprano parts are taken by boys, remains unequalled as a model of its kind. Boys' voices, when, as here, so exceptionally fine as to be equal to the demands of the music, seem best adapted to its sacred character, as we then get perfect purity of tone combined with simplicity and self-forgetfulness on the part of the singer.

Of orchestral societies, the Philharmonic, under Hans Richter, is the most prominent. The first concert of the season included an item of peculiar interest—a novelty so far as the audience were concerned—Bach's Concerto in a major, for two horns, three oboes, bassoon, and violin. All the parts were very successfully executed. The second opened with Berlioz's Overture to the 'Francis Juges.' If we find in this early work of the composer's less sustained originality than in his riper productions, it still possesses many characteristic features, and, faultlessly and brilliantly performed, it proved thoroughly effective. For exactitude, careful nuances of colouring, unflagging spirit, and unity of ensemble, Herr Richter's orchestra has no rival to dread. The brevity of programme which is here the order of the day has the advantage of ensuring due respect and attention to each work performed. Such a concert rarely exceeds an hour and a half in length, whereas in London it is common for two symphonies, two overtures, a concerto, and several vocal pieces to be included in a single evening's bill of fare, the first and last items serving chiefly to play the audience into and out of their places.

The opening concert of the Gesellschaft der Musik Freunde, another notable orchestral society, was marked by a superb performance of Brahms's Schicksalslied. The richness and beauty of the female voices especially was very striking. But we are in the land of fine voices. It would be curious to count up how many of the eminent "cantatrices" of the day belong to the Austrian dominions. Such a list, headed by Madames Pauline Lucca, Materna, Ilma de Muraka, and Etelka Gerster, would be long and brilliant. The choir gave also some pieces without accompaniment, among which it was interesting to find a madrigal by John Dowland and a part-song by Henry Morley. The genius for part-song writing is one that nobody can deny to our countrymen. No nation, Germany excepted, is richer than our own in spontaneous characteristic compositions of this kind. The splendid concert-room of the Musik-Verein, the St. James's Hall of Vienna, is superior acoustically to the latter building. On occasions such as those described it is crowded to excess. An overture of Berlioz's, a concerto of Beethoven's, a symphony of Mendelssohn's, suffice to draw together such an audience as in London could only be commanded by some phenomenal pianist or singer. The hall, as well as a smaller concert-room for performances of chamber music, forms part of the building of the Conservatorium. Among quartet concerts, those of the veteran leader Hellmesberger are held in high repute, and a special interest attached to their last programme, which included Brahms's Quartet in c minor, the composer himself assisting at the piano. His masterly interpretation rendered material aid to the success of the composition, which was on this occasion unqualified.

The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the composer Kreutzer was celebrated here on Wednesday last by a representation of 'Das Nachtlager von Granada,' the single opera of his that can be said to have kept the stage. Its permanent continuance there seems unlikely. It owed its popularity to its suiting the taste of the day rather than to more sterling and enduring qualities, and now that the day and the taste have changed, a want of backbone is severely felt. But it contains some spirited choruses, which, as also the trio in the finale, were well received. Vienna opera-goers have infinite variety to choose from. Among forthcoming novelties of the winter season we find Léon Delibes's new work, 'Jean de Nivelle,' in which it is said Madame Lucca is to perform the chief rôle, and a new opera by Ignaz Brüll, entitled 'Bianca,' is to be produced on December 15th. Wagner's 'Siegfried' and 'Götterdämmerung' are promised later. The tenor part of Siegfried is to be taken by Herr Winkelmann, from Hamburg, who makes his first appearance here. H. Z.

Musical Society.

THE Italian opera season is advertised to close this (Saturday) evening. The only event calling for notice this week is the performance of 'Aida,' which was more satisfactory than most of the representations given during the present series. The Aida of Madame Zocchi and the Amosaro of Signor Aldighieri were embodiments of considerable artistic merit, and the ensemble was nearly all that could be desired.

On Saturday last Madame Norman Néruda made her first appearance this season at the Popular Concerts. Her sole was Rust's not very interesting Sonata in D, which she plays rather too often. But the finest performance of the afternoon was that of Schumann's Quartet in A minor, a more splendid rendering of which cannot be imagined. Chopin's Rondo à la Mazur, Op. 5, played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and Rheinberger's favourite Piano Quartet in A flat, Op. 38, were also in the programme. Mr. Santley was the vocalist. On Monday the works performed were Mozart's Quartet in D minor, Schumann's Quintet in A flat, Op. 44, and Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor, Op. 28. Mdlle. Janotha was the pianist and Mr. F. King the vocalist.

THE Bach Choir announce three subscription concerts, to be given at St. James's Hall on March 3rd, April 6th, and May 18th. The list of works to be performed is excellent, including Bach's Mass in A minor, his fine cantata "Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis," and his Sonatas in A, Brahms's 'Deutsches Requiem,' the "Gloria" from Cherubini's Mass in D minor, Handel's 'Alexander's Feast,' with Mozart's additional accompaniments, Schumann's 'Requiem for Mignon,' and the finale to 'Loreley,' besides motets and madrigals by Palestrina, Vittoria, and Perceval.

FROM a preliminary "Invitation for Subscription," issued by the managers of the Richter Concerts, we learn that nine concerts will be given at St. James's Hall during the months of May and June. The works announced for production are the Ninth Symphony and the 'Missa Solennis' of Beethoven, the same composer's 'Egmont' music complete, the whole of Schumann's 'Manfred,' of which only a few fragments have as yet been heard in this country, the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music by Mendelssohn, and selections from Wagner, Liszt, and Berlioz. A more inviting scheme has never been offered to the public; and we trust that the concerts will be warmly supported.

THE Philharmonic Society announces a series of six concerts, to be given at St. James's Hall on February 24th, March 10th and 24th, April 7th, May 12th and 26th, 1881. No further details are as yet published; but it is to be hoped, in the best interests of one of our oldest and most honoured musical institutions, that some radical changes will be made in its policy. It has for some time been obvious to all unprejudiced observers that the course pursued of late years can only result in the ultimate, if not in the speedy, collapse of the Society—an issue which all musicians would deplore.

It is said that Herr Rubinstein will visit London next season, and will appear at the Musical Union Matinees, to be given under the direction of M. Lacerre.

H. R. H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT has graciously consented to preside at the 143rd anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians, which will be held in St. James's Hall on Thursday, February 10th.

THE first performance in London of Mr. Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch' is to be given at the Crystal Palace this afternoon, under the direction of the composer.

'LA KORRICANT,' a ballet in two acts, the music composed by M. Widor, was produced at the Paris Opera on the 1st inst., with great success. The French musical journals speak in the highest terms of the music.

AUBER's opera 'Le Serment' has lately been revived at the Stadttheater, Hamburg, and has been very favourably received.

WAGNER's 'Meistersinger' has recently been given for the first time in Magdeburg. It is stated that not fewer than 179 rehearsals were held for the work, viz., 75 for principals, 80 for the chorus, 4 for ensemble, 3 for the mise en scène, and 17 for orchestra.

CHERUBINI's 'Medea' was revived at the Vienna Opera on the 26th ult., after an absence from that stage of sixty years. The part of the heroine was finely rendered by Frau Materna.

BAFF's tenth symphony, entitled 'Zur Herbstzeit,' has recently been performed for the first time at a concert at Wiesbaden.

A NEW amateur musical society has been established at Vienna, for the performance of choral and orchestral works by modern composers.

THE WEEK.

MR. JAMES'S.—'Good Fortune,' a Comedy in Three Acts. From the French of Octave Feuillet by C. F. Coghlan.
SADLER'S WELLS.—'The Son of the Wilderness.'
COURT.—'Two Old Boys,' a Comedietta. From the French of Henri Meilhac by James Mortimer.

How ticklish are, in managerial estimation, the times in which we live may be guessed from the sparing use that is made of novelty. Like youth between wisdom and pleasure, the manager stands between the untried and the proved, and of the cajoleries of each he is equally mistrustful. With the latter the triumph more commonly rests. Even this, however, must be worn, like the rue distributed by Ophelia—the suggestion, if unkind, is at least natural—"with a difference." Douglas Jerrold must be readjusted to suit the patrons of the St. James's, and Schiller rewritten to please the followers of the Court. When a piece so familiar as 'Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre' of M. Octave Feuillet has to come once more on the stage, it must be in a new version, though three are already in existence. That the rendering which was produced in the United States, and that Oxenford's adaptation, 'Ivy Hall,' played in 1859 at the Princess's, a few months after the production of the original play at the Vaudeville, should not commend themselves is natural. The former is a mere bald translation, conserving all that is most Gallic in the original, and the latter could not succeed at its first performance in winning a favourable verdict. 'A Hero of Romance,' however, in which Mr. Sothorn played in 1868 at the Haymarket, might, as the successful work of one of our most competent dramatists, have been supposed to commend itself to the St. James's management. Not at all. A spick-and-span version is held to be safer than one already tried, and a fourth rendering of an indifferent play is supplied by Mr. Coghlan. In this, in spite of the transference of the scene to England and the alteration effected in one or two of the characters, the original is followed with fidelity, and such curious episodes are preserved as that in the first act in which the hero, when explaining to a friend who is under deep obligation to him that he is penniless, is consoled with a cigar. Mr. Coghlan's workmanship is, however, moderately successful, and the points in which the performance fails to commend itself to the public are those for which he is scarcely responsible. In every version the heroine is to a certain extent repugnant, her character, to be natural, needing the explanations which are afforded in the novel, but for which the play does not furnish space. The termination is necessarily weak, since, after the great situation of the second act—the third of the original—it is scarcely possible to find a dénouement wholly in keeping. To Mr. Coghlan it cannot in justice be attributed that the hero is a "faultless monster which the world ne'er saw." In mercy, however, to human powers of credulity, the author of the fourth version might have diminished somewhat the splendour of his central character. To unite in one personage all that is best, noblest, most heroic, and most exemplary in those whom the world has chiefly honoured is to overtax the faith of a not too credulous age.

That the termination seems weaker than before is attributable in part to the management. It is an unavoidable consequence of the system now adopted that the necessity to accept the conventional which faces the spectator meets him at the most awkward point. That the conventional can ever, in pieces of any dramatic value, be wholly dismissed is inconceivable. From small pieces like 'Old Cronies,' recently removed from the bill at the St. James's, or 'The Vicarage,' now in course of performance at the Haymarket, it almost disappears. To more important dramas it is indispensable. When the action of a play is carried on by men and women whom we recognize as identical with those around us, when the scenes are those with which we are familiar, and when there is nothing to tell us we are not contemplating real proceedings, improbability of story, when we have to front it, administers a shock. Thus in the present drama the public will not believe in the species of bouleversement that transfers to the penniless hero the entire fortune of the heroine, and so renders possible a union which under circumstances previously existing was inconceivable. These matters must not be ignored by managers or by dramatists. The play was received with favour, though the later scenes were scarcely to the taste of the public.

Mrs. Kendal, who during the last two or three years has effected a revolution in style, played with much force as the heroine. Mr. Kendal, in whom improvement is even more noteworthy, since it takes the shape of the creation of a style instead of its modification, was also worthy of praise. In other characters—with the single exception of a country baronet, unhappily conceived by the author, and not more successfully rendered by the actor—Mr. Hare's excellently trained company was seen to advantage. One performance, that of a poor relation by Mrs. Stephens, was excellent. 'Good Fortune' is admirably mounted.

A curious experiment has been tried at Sadler's Wells in mounting 'The Son of the Wilderness' ('Der Sohn der Wildnis'), a once familiar drama of the Baron de Münch-Bellinghausen, better known under the nom de plume of Frederick Halm. Originally produced at Drury Lane while that theatre was under the management of Mr. Anderson, this strange piece obtained a certain amount of vogue. Times have changed since the middle of the century, and the play, though it is still occasionally revived in Germany, and especially in Vienna, in which city its author died a decade ago, is in this country almost a byword. Its action supplies a new setting to the story of Cymon and Iphigenia told by Boccaccio and Dryden, and shows a maiden of the Phocæan colony which tradition affirms to have founded Marseilles subjugating and civilizing by her charms a prince of the Tectosages. Mr. Warner shows savage energy as the young chieftain Ingomar. Miss Isabel Bateman is Parthenia, the heroine. The translation we assume to be that of Mrs. Lovell. From the acting version of Charlton it differs in many respects.

A version, by Mr. Mortimer, of 'Suzanne et les Deux Vieillards,' a one-act comedy of M. Meilhac, produced in 1868 at the Gymnase, has been played at the Court, under the title of 'Two Old Boys.' It adheres pretty closely to the original, and is well acted by Mr. Anson, Mr. Price, and Miss Emery.

Grandis Gossig.

ONE of those miscellaneous performances which are seldom seen except on the occasion of benefits, was given on Monday at Drury Lane, in aid of what is known as the Harcourt Testimonial Fund. Recitations by Mr. Irving and Mr. A. Stirling, a comic lecture by Mr. Toole, and scenes from the pieces now in course of performance at the various theatres constituted the programme. A sum not far short of two thousand pounds was taken in the shape of subscriptions or payments at the theatre.

THE burlesque of 'Robbing Boy,' by Mr. Burnand, has been revived at the Imperial. It is performed by the company which originally presented it at the Gaiety.

THE forthcoming production of 'La Morte Civile,' of Signor Giacometti, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, will show Mr. Coghlan, who will appear as the hero, in an ambitious and a difficult rôle. The first performance is fixed for Saturday next.

'THE HONEYMOON' of Tobin has been revived at three consecutive performances at the Gaiety. The representations, however, have little interest.

THE Italian poet Pietro Cosca has just completed a new tragedy, which he intends to call 'The Neapolitans of 1799.' The principal characters are the notorious Cardinal Ruffo, King Ferdinand, Admiral Nelson, and Lady Hamilton. The first representation is to take place at Bologna, under the management of the excellent actress Virginia Marini.

HEINRICH LAUBE, the late well-known director of the Vienna Court Theatre and dramatic author, has, since his retirement from stage life, devoted himself to writing novels. The septuagenarian, after achieving a success with his longer work, 'Die Böhmingen,' is now engaged upon a novelette, 'Louison,' which will shortly appear in a German magazine.

EVERY now and then we hear of an actor slain by a piece of reprehensible carelessness. Such a case is now reported from Poitiers, where, in a performance of 'Les Pirates de la Savane,' one actor was shot dead by his fellow. Now assuming, as we are justified in doing, that there has been no malicious purpose, we may ask, How is it possible that such a thing as a ball cartridge ever finds its way into a theatre? In place of gunpowder, which needs wadding, in itself sufficiently dangerous, could not theatrical managements employ for stage purposes some species of detonating ball, the effect of which would render impossible such loss of life and sight as now occasionally occurs?

WASHINGTON IRVING'S LITTLE

BRITAIN, together with the SPECTRE BRIDGEMOOR and a LEGEND of ALBERT HOLLOWAY. Illustrated by 120 very fine Engravings on Wood by Mr. J. Cooper, designed by Mr. Charles Murray. Square crown 8vo. cloth extra, gilt edges, price 12s. 6d.

The Times of November 30 says:—"Murray, Sampson Low & Co. publish a charming edition of Washington Irving's 'Little Britain.' It was but the other day we noticed the superb Library Edition of his collected works, which is in course of publication by this firm. Mr. Charles Murray's illustrations form a most appropriate accompaniment, and we can say them no higher praise than to say that they are entirely in the spirit of Mr. Chubb's admirable designs to the same writer 'Barnaby Rudge'."

"The volume is one of the prettiest and best of its kind that could be given at this time of year."—Standard.
"The illustrations are exceptionally good."—Obituary Journal.
"A very pretty volume."—Spectator.
"The illustrations are some of the best of the kind and execution."—Standard.
"It cannot fail to be among the most popular of the gift-books of the season."—John Bull.

DALZIELS' BIBLE GALLERY.

SIXTY-NINE ILLUSTRATIONS FROM

THE OLD TESTAMENT.

FROM ORIGINAL DRAWINGS BY

SIR FREDERICK LEIGHTON, P.R.A., E. J. POYNTER, R.A., HOLMAN HUNT, AND OTHER EMINENT ARTISTS.

ENGRAVED BY THE BROTHERS DALZIEL.

1,000 Copies, handsomely bound in vellum and leatherette ... £6 5 0 per Copy.
100 " mounted on hand-made paper, in Portfolio ... 10 10 0 "

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, 31st November, 1880, says—

"During the coming season, if any one desires to make a Christmas or New Year's present in the form of a book, he will surely be attracted by 'Dalziel's Bible Gallery,' which is a book of the noblest proportions and of most artistic quality. Messrs. Dalziel have evidently done their part as engravers and printers with a determination that this should be the crowning work of their successful career."

The ART JOURNAL says:—

"Thanks are due to Messrs. Dalziel for engraving and compiling such a work as the foregoing, for it is more than an illustration of the Bible; it is an almost complete illustration of the best art of the centre of the century. Many fine works may be issued this Christmas, but none of them will surpass 'Dalziel's Bible Gallery.'"

MONTANISM and the PRIMITIVE CHURCH:
A Study in the Ecclesiastical History of the Second Century.

"Even if here and there we are not quite of the same opinion as Mr. De Soyer, we must admit that he has produced a work which we future students of the church history of the second century can afford to neglect."

"Das Urtheil, es wolle der Verfasser denselben (Schilern) Arbeit getrieben, ist nicht nur, es hat von G. O. Arnold, Wernsdorf, Mitsch u. A. ungenügend, resp. irrig beurtheilt. Der Verfasser hat das folgende ganz gethan, um es nach etw. und pünktlich zu begründen."

"The task has been performed with careful research, united with a broad outlook and the preservation of a catholic spirit, which make the volume one of real value."

"A storehouse of varied, well-selected, and digested learning on the subject."—Examiner.

EPPS'S GLYCERINE JUJUBES.

Glycerine in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of speaking, becomes a lively heating, moistening, and soothing agent, and is highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

A letter received:—Gentlemen—It may perhaps interest you to know that after an extended trial I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit, with or without medical treatment, in almost all forms of throat disease. They soothe and clear the voice. In no case can they do any harm. Yours faithfully, Gordon Holmes, M.D., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary.

THE exceptional value of THE ROYAL SHAKSPERE will be that it will be printed in BOLD, CLEAR, READABLE TYPE, with Illustrations, principally STEEL PLATES, engraved from ORIGINALS by the eminent modern Artists whose names are given above.

This ROYAL SHAKSPERE will be a COMPLETE EDITION of the great Dramatist's Plays and Poems, arranged in chronological order from the Text of the eminent Shaksperian scholar Professor DELIUS. 'Edward III.' and 'The Two Noble Kinsmen' will be included. There will also be an Introduction and Life of Shakspeare by Mr. F. J. FURNIVALL, Founder and Director of the New Shakspeare Society, who shows the proper method of studying Shakspeare, recounts the story of the Poet's life, and presents a chronological arrangement of the Plays and Poems. The growth and unity of Shakspeare's thought, the links between his successive Plays, the light thrown on each by comparison with the others, and the treatment of the same or like incidents in the different periods of Shakspeare's life, are all traced with minuteness, care, and skill. Of this Introduction it has been justly remarked, that "for the general and even scholarly reader it supersedes nearly the whole vast library of works on this well-worn yet ever-new theme."

In producing, therefore, the Works of Shakspeare in the form, with the advantages, and at the price above announced, the Publishers have every confidence that it will be widely welcomed on its merits, and be regarded as pre-eminently the most complete FINE-ART EDITION of SHAKSPERE yet published.

LIFE of WILLIAM BLAKE. With Selections from his Poems and other Writings. Illustrated from Blake's own Works. By ALEXANDER GILCHRIST. A New and Enlarged Edition, with Additional Letters and a Memoir of the Author. 30 vols. cloth gilt, with Designs by Frederick J. Shields, after Blake, medium 8vo. 2s. 3d.

Illustrations have been added to this Work, which has long since taken its position as the standard authority on its subject. Among others, the following may be mentioned:—The Phillips Portrait of Blake; Two new Portraits by Blake of his Wife; a new Plate from the 'Jerusalem'; a newly-discovered Design by 'Hamlet'; and a Drawing of Blake's Cottage at Felpham. New Photographures of the 'Inventions to the Book of Job' are given. Some Thirty Additional Letters are included in the Biographical Portion of the Work, forming a new link to the already interesting life of Blake. Mr. W. M. Rossetti has Revised, Enlarged, and Perfected the Annotated Catalogue of Blake's Works that appeared in the First Edition of the Book.

The IRISH LAND LAWS. By Alexander G. Richey, Q.C. LL.D.,

Deputy Regius Professor of Feudal and English Law in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"To all who, either as legislators or publicists, are called on to take part in the present controversy, the book will prove invaluable. The relation of the work to the discussions which now occupy so much attention is well expressed. It would be difficult to find any series of legislative problems stated with greater clearness, sequence, and precision. We can recommend this little book to all who speak, write, or seriously think upon this question in or out of Parliament."—Times.

ISLAND LIFE; or, the Phenomena and Causes of Insular

Flora and Fauna, including an entire Revision of the Problem of Geological Climates. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of 'The Malay Archipelago,' 'The Geographical Distribution of Animals,' &c. Medium 8vo. with Illustrations and Maps, 16s.

"Mr. Wallace has written nothing more clear, more masterly, or more convincing than this delightful volume. As a whole 'Island Life' is almost above criticism. Mr. Wallace brings to his task a rare combination of qualities not usually compatible with one another."—Fortnightly Review.

The HEAD of MEDUSA. By George Fleming, Author of 'A

His Novel' and 'Mirage.' 3 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

"The striking feature of this novel is the character of Count Cesare Lalli, a type of the modern Italian. We have some quarrels, indeed, with Mr. Fleming, which, did occasion serve, we might urge. But we prefer to take leave of this really fine work of art with an expression of sincere admiration and pleasure."—Pall Mall Gazette.

RE-ISSUE of COOPER'S LE KHUI'S

MEMORIALS of CAMBRIDGE.

Greatly Enlarged and Rewritten from the Work of LE KHUI. By the late H. COOPER, F.R.S. Author of 'The Annals of Cambridge and Ashmolean Catalogue,' &c. 1,175 pages, 50 Woodcuts in the text, 124 Plates by Le Khui, &c., &c., and selling 50 Sketches by Robert Farren.

"One need not be a prophet to forecast that 200 years hence Mr. Cooper's work will be more often cited than any other Cambridge book of our time."—Professor John E. B. Mayor.

Large Imperial 4to. 26 Sketches printed on Dutch paper, handsomely bound in cloth, 25s.

BYRON'S POOL to ELY. Drawn and Etched by R. Farren.

"In some of the smaller plates there is capital work. The large drawings are, however, the best of them. Trumpington Bridge (8), Paradise (9), Trinity Bridge (10), Grassy Corner (11), Herringbone (12), New Quay (13), and Ely, the last stage of this pleasant journey, are particularly good."—Times.

"Here is a collection of etchings which are a pure delight to every lover of river scenery, and which must be an especial joy to every Cambridge man. We do not know how to praise Mr. Farren sufficiently for his beautiful and melancholy 'Queen's Bridge' and his 'Magdalene College.' These are etchings worthy of being framed and hung where they can always be in view."—Saturday Review.

"The book will have a sale this Christmas, and it is not unworthy of it."—Academy.

ATHENÆUM.

"One of the most richly illustrated books of the class....
It would occupy too much of our space to describe all the bright and pleasing views in which the book abounds so richly that nearly every page is enlivened by their presence."

ACADEMY.

"Taken as a whole this handsome volume may be considerably recommended to Swiss travellers and lovers of illustrated books, both for the number and general excellence of its woodcuts and the substantial merit of the letter-press which accompanies them."

SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Among the large illustrated books of foreign countries,
'Switzerland: its Scenery and its People,' seems one of the most commendable.... The letter-press is replete with information."

PRE-HISTORIC EUROPE: a Geological Sketch. By JAMES GEIKIE, LL.D. F.R.S., &c., of H.M.'s Geological Survey of Scotland, Author of 'The Great Ice Age.'

"Dr Geikie's object in the present volume is to give an outline of what appears to have been the most considerable physical changes experienced in Europe since the beginning of the Pleistocene or Quaternary period, the period immediately preceding that which is now being wrought out and which Dr Geikie divides into Pleistocene and Recent. He attempts to describe in a more systematic manner than has hitherto been attempted, that succession of changes, climatic and geographical which taken together constitute the historical geology of Pleistocene, Postglacial, and Recent times. This he does in a more thorough and complete manner than, we venture to think, has ever been done before."—Times.

By the same Author,

The GREAT ICE AGE, and its Relation to the Antiquity of Man. Second Edition, Revised. Demy 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 34s.

Fourth Edition, Revised, embodying the Reports of the Royal Coal Commission, demy 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 16s.

The COALFIELDS of GREAT BRITAIN: their History, Structure, and Resources; with Descriptions of the Coalfields of our Indian and Colonial Empire, and of other Parts of the World. By EDWARD HULL, M.A. F.R.S., Director of the Geological Survey of Ireland, Author of 'The Physical Geology and Geography of Ireland.'

"This Edition has been largely rewritten. It contains an entirely new chapter on Carboniferous Plants, kindly drawn up by Professor Williamson F.R.S., of Manchester. The Classification of the Carboniferous Series of Rocks has been modified in accordance with the views enunciated in my paper on the subject, read before the Geological Society of London in 1877. The account of the various coalfields has been modified in accordance with more recent investigations as far as any information extends, and the statistical portions have been brought down to the date of 1878."—Editorial Preface.

By the same Author,

The PHYSICAL GEOLOGY and GEOGRAPHY of IRELAND. Post 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 7s.

Second Edition, crown 8vo. with 77 Illustrations, cloth, 7s. 6d.; or in calf extra, marbled edges, 13s.

A SHORT HISTORY of NATURAL SCIENCE, and of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Day. For the Use of Schools and Young Persons. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Author of 'Life and her Children,' 'The Fairyland of Science,' 'Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students.'

"Guides to literature abound; guides to science, similar in purpose and execution, are not numerous. The writer's plan, therefore, is original, and her execution of the plan is altogether admirable. She sees clearly what she describes, and the interest felt by the author is imparted to the reader. Diagrams and illustrations of the letter-press add to the value of the compendium."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Large post 8vo. cloth gilt, each 21s.; or in calf gilt, marbled edges, 36s.

STANFORD'S COMPENDIUM of GEOGRAPHY and TRAVEL for General Reading. Based on Heliwald's 'Die Erde und ihre Völker.' Translated by A. H. KEANE, B.A. A Series of Volumes descriptive of the Great Divisions of the Globe.AFRICA. Edited and Extended by KEITH JOHNSTON, F.R.G.S., late Leader of the Royal Geographical Society's East African Expedition. With 15 Maps, Ethnological Appendix, and 66 Illustrations.CENTRAL and SOUTH AMERICA. Edited and Extended by H. W. HATES, Assistant-Secretary of the Royal Geographical Society. Author of 'The Mountains of the Amazon.' With 12 Maps, Ethnological Appendix, and 73 Illustrations.AUSTRALASIA. Edited and Extended by A. R. WALLACE, F.R.G.S., Author of 'The Malay Archipelago.' With 30 Maps, Ethnological Appendix, and 36 Illustrations.

"The English reading public may be congratulated on possessing in these volumes a compendium of geography and travel unsurpassed in this or any other language."—Geographical Magazine.

Fifth Edition, greatly Enlarged, post 8vo. with Geological Map printed in Colours, and numerous Additions, Illustrations of Fossils, Sections, and Landscapes, cloth, 18s.; or in calf extra, marbled edges, 31s.

The PHYSICAL GEOLOGY and GEOGRAPHY of GREAT BRITAIN. By ANDREW C. RAMSAY, LL.D. F.R.S., Director-General of the Geological Surveys of the United Kingdom.

"No better introduction to the principles of geology could possibly be recommended to the English reader. It is a work of the highest value, and one worthy to take a foremost place among popular manuals of science."—Nature.

Fcap. folio, 12s. 6d.

ATLAS of ANATOMY; or, Pictures of the Human Body.

In 25 etc. Coloured Plates, comprising 100 separate Figures. With Descriptive Letter-press by Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, Member of the London School Board, Author of the Physiological Sections of 'Simple Lessons for Home Use,' &c.

"Mrs. Miller has made a most successful endeavour to encourage the general study of anatomy in a precise, and not in what would be termed a popular form. This atlas is a really systematic work on anatomy, and will, we believe, play no mean part in the diffusion of true, precise, scientific knowledge."—Athenæum.

Crown 8vo. Illustrated, price 4s. 6d.

MODERN METEOROLOGY: a Series of Six Lectures delivered under the auspices of the Meteorological Society. By Dr. MAYN, F.R.S.; J. K. LAUGHTON, F.R.G.S.; R. STRACHAN, Rev. W. CLEMENT LEY, M.A.; G. J. SYMONS, F.R.S.; and R. H. SCOTT, M.A. F.R.S.

"The series of six lectures on Modern Meteorology delivered under the auspices of the Meteorological Society last year have been gathered together into a volume with illustrations and published for the benefit of those who were not fortunate enough to attend that valuable course of addresses. The lectures are all given by men who have devoted special attention to the department of science, which may be said to owe its origin to the facilities afforded by the electric telegraph for the rapid accumulation of facts. As with most lectures, the style is popular."—Daily News.

STUDIES in ENGLISH LITERATURE. By John Dennis,

Editor of 'English Sonnets: a Selection from 1641,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.; or in calf extra, marbled edges, 12s.

Contents.—Pope—Defoe—Prior—Steele—The Warton—John Wesley—Southey—English Lyric Poetry—English Rural Poetry—The English Sonnet.

"An excellent book. It has the charm—quite captivating in these days—of being entirely void of affectation, extravagance, or any taint of egotism; and it displays sound judgment, both moral and æsthetic, and a thorough mastery of the subjects with which it deals."—Edinburgh.

HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE: Readings in Necessary Knowledge for Girls and Young Women. Edited by the Rev. J. P. FAUTHORPE, M.A., Principal of Whitlands College. Dedicated, by permission, to His Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G.

"It is a thoroughly efficient and comprehensive manual, and contains more information than half a dozen primers of health or social science. It would be a useful book to add to village lending libraries, or to give as prizes to Sunday schools, or as presents to young servants. It is indeed a pity that this, or some other book of the same sort, is not more commonly in use in so-called ladies' schools and private schools."—Sunday Review.

Crown 8vo. with upwards of 100 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.; or in calf extra, marbled edges, 11s.

LIFE and HER CHILDREN: Glimpses of Animal Life from the Amoeba to the Insects. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Author of 'The Fairyland of Science,' 'A Short History of Natural Science,' 'Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students.'

"Life and Her Children is a praiseworthy and admirable attempt to tell us something of the children that life sends forth, and of their history. Its main object is to acquaint young people with the structure and habits of the lower forms of life, but in our deliberate judgment it will do a great deal more. None will read its introductory chapter without advantage, and few will read the volume through without enjoyment. It constitutes the book's chief charm is the marvellously simple, yet quite scientific style which runs through it, the food for thought and future study which it affords, and the truly philosophic glow which lights up its every page. The work forms a charming introduction to the study of zoology—the science of living things—which we trust will find its way into many hands."—Nature.

By the same Authoress, uniform in size and price.

The FAIRYLAND of SCIENCE. Eighth Thousand.

BOTANY for CHILDREN: an Illustrated Elementary Text-book for Junior Classes and Young Children. By the Rev. GEORGE HENSLAW, M.A. F.R.S. F.G.S., Author of 'Floral Dissections.'

"Just such an elementary text-book of botany as might be put into practical use in schools without the slightest doubt that children would take to it."—Review of Science.

Second Edition, post 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

Adapted for Home Education, and for Schoolmistresses and Pupil Teachers. By ROBERT JAMES MANN, M.D., late Superintendent of Education at Natal.

"Mr. Mann's directions are practical and judicious, and frequently he says a good deal that is worth attention in a few words. The little volume is one in which most people who have, or are likely to have, anything to do with household cares will find some hints worth noting."—Sunday Review.

Fcap. folio, each 7s. 6d.

NOTES ON IRISH ARCHITECTURE. Edited by

MARGARET MCNAIR STOKES, Lady Associate of the Scottish Society of Antiquaries. With very numerous fine Photographic Illustrations and Wood Engravings. Imperial 4to. 2 vols. 4s. 4s. each.
"Under the unassuming title of 'Notes,' Lord Bannerman and his accomplished executrix, Miss Stokes, have put forth not only a most elegant, but a most elaborate and valuable contribution towards the study of Irish architecture, from its rude, though even then remarkable, beginnings, down to the period of the English invasion and settlement, after, and in consequence of which, it ceased to bear an exclusively Irish character."—Archæological Journal.

EARLY CHRISTIAN ARCHITECTURE IN IRELAND.

By MARGARET STOKES, M.A. With very numerous Woodcut Illustrations. Imperial 8vo. 11s. 6d.
"In the present work Miss Stokes has brought within the reach of the general reader the truth, and probably the whole truth, as far as it can ever be known, about the ancient ecclesiastical architecture of Ireland. People who enjoy graphic descriptions, pretty pictures, and a subject as romantic as any of the cruises into foreign lands, so popular with subscribers to circulating libraries, will find this one of the best books of the year."—Saturday Review.

WE and the WORLD: a Story for Boys. With 7 Illustrations by W. L. JONES, Jr.

"A very good book, it is full of adventure, graphically told. The style is just what it should be, simple, but not dull, full of pleasant humor, and with some pretty touches of feeling. Like all Mrs. Ewing's tales, it is sound, sensible, and wholesome."—Times.

"We have had many books of adventure, but nothing better; very little so good as this."—Full Mail Gazette.

Uniform with the above, Fifth Edition, 4s.

SIX to SIXTEEN: a Story for Girls. With 10 Illustrations by Mrs. Allingham.

"It is a beautifully told story, full of humor and pathos, and bright sketches of scenery and character."—Full Mail Gazette.

"We have rarely met, on such a modest scale, with characters so ably and simply drawn."—Athenæum.

"The tone of the book is pleasant and healthy, and singularly free from that sentimentalism so many 'maiden' tales which is apt to disfigure such productions. The illustrations by Mrs. Allingham add a special attraction to the little volume."—Times.

Uniform with the above, Ninth Edition, 6s.

A FLAT IRON for a FARTHING; or, some Passages in the Life of an Only Son. With 12 Illustrations by M. Allingham.

"Let every parent and guardian who wishes to be amused, and at the same time to please a child, purchase 'A Flat Iron for a Farthing.'"—Athenæum.

MRS. OVERTHEWAY'S REMEMBRANCES. With 10

Illustrations by Pasquier and Wolf.

"Without exception, 'Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances' is the most delightful work ever written for children that we have ever read. There are passages in this book which the genius of George Eliot would be proud to own."—Leader.

Uniform with the above, Second Edition, 4s.

JAN of the WINDMILL: a Story of the Plain. With 11

Illustrations by Mrs. Allingham. Also a Large Edition, crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

"It is a long time since we have read anything in its way so good. Such a book is like a day in June—so sweet and so wholesome as anything can be. Good as Mrs. Allingham's breezy stories are, even they are but juvenile beside such writing as this."—American Church Union.

Uniform with the above, 3s.

Illustrations.

"Never has Mrs. Ewing published a more charming volume of stories, and that is saying a very great deal. From the first to the last the book overflows with the strange knowledge of child-nature which so surely survives childhood, and, moreover, with inexhaustible quiet humor, which is never anything but innocent and well-bred, never priggish, and never clumsy."—Athenæum.

Uniform Edition, 10s. 6d. per Volume.

UNIFORM WITH 'THE TREATYSE OF FYSSHYNGE WYTH AN ANGLE.'

Shortly will be published, in demy 4to. printed on hand-made paper, and bound in vellum.

A FAC-SIMILE OF The Boke of Saint Alban's,

By Dame JULIANA BERNERS.

Containing the TREATISES on HAWKING, HUNTING, and HERALDRY. Printed at St. Alban's, by the Schoolmaster-Printer, in 1486. With an Introduction by WILLIAM BLADES, Author of the 'Life and Typography of Caxton.'

This fac-simile is faithfully reproduced by photography. It is being printed on rough hand-made paper similar to that of the original, and will be bound in handsome contemporary binding. The interest and value of this reproduction will be greatly enhanced by Mr. BLADES's Preface, which treats at length, in separate chapters, of the ALPHABET, TYPOGRAPHY, BIBLIOGRAPHY, SUBJECT-MATTER, and PHILOLOGY of the Work.

* * A FULL PROSPECTUS CONCERNING THE PUBLICATION OF 'THE BOKE OF SAINT ALBAN'S' WILL BE SENT ON APPLICATION TO THE PUBLISHER.

COMPANION VOLUME TO 'THE BOKE OF SAINT ALBAN'S.' THE FIRST ENGLISH BOOK ON FISHING.

Now ready, in demy 4to. printed on hand-made paper, and bound in antique vellum, price 18s.

The Treatyse of Fysshynge wyth an Angle.

By Dame JULIANA BERNERS.

A fac-simile Reproduction of the First Edition, printed by Wynkyn de Worde, at Westminster, in 1496. With an Introduction by the Rev. M. G. WATKINS.

The extreme rarity of this work, and the great interest taken in it by connoisseurs, has suggested to the Publisher the advisability of producing a fac-simile Reproduction for the use of those Collectors and Anglers who can never hope to possess the almost priceless original. This present fac-simile is reproduced from a copy of the original edition in the British Museum by means of photography, and consequently renders every regularity of the original in faithful detail; the rude illustrations which adorned the first edition of this "lytill plauget" are here given in all their quaint roughness. The work is printed on hand-made paper of the same texture and colour as that on which the first edition appeared, and the binding is of contemporary pattern and material, so that the reader of to-day in handling this volume can realise the form and appearance of the original, which must have delighted the eyes of those who studied "treatyse percyngynge to dyvers playmunt matters belongynge vnto noblesse."

In crown 8vo. handsomely printed and beautifully illustrated from Photographs, price 1s.

A Descriptive Account of the Roman Villa at Brading, Hants.

By CORNELIUS NICHOLSON, Esq., F.S.A.

In crown 8vo. uniform with 'The Bibliography of Dickens,' price 6s. cloth.

The Bibliography of Thackeray.

A Bibliographical List, arranged in Chronological Order, of the Published Writings in Prose and Verse, and the Drawings and Sketches, of WM. MAKEPEACE THACKERAY, from 1839 to 1880. A Companion and Supplement to Thackeray's Works.

* * 250 COPIES ARE PRINTED ON LARGE PAPER, UNIFORM IN SIZE AND STYLE WITH THE ÉDITION DE LUXE OF THACKERAY'S WORKS, FOR THE USE OF SUBSCRIBERS TO THAT EDITION, AND CAN BE HAD ON APPLICATION TO THE PUBLISHER.

Now ready, price 6s. in cloth; or in French gray wrapper, 3s.

The Bibliography of Dickens.

A Bibliographical List of the Published Writings in Prose and Verse of CHARLES DICKENS, from 1834 to 1880, including his Letters and Speeches.

"A most laboriously compiled and minute bibliography."—Book-reviewer.
"This little work will be prized by all who admire the genius of Dickens, and desire to be comprehensively acquainted with his books, magazine contributions, speeches, and letters. Mr. Shepherd's well-known accuracy is a voucher for the correctness of his specifications."—Literary World.

In addition to these contributions, many other interesting papers, by well-known writers, will find their places in the pages of THE ANTIQUARY. The other departments of the Magazine which have proved acceptable to its readers will be maintained with equal interest during the coming year.

* * A Prospectus will be sent on application.

LITERATURE

Arrows of the Chase: being a Collection of Scattered Letters. By John Ruskin. Edited by an Oxford Pupil. With Preface by the Author. 2 vols. (Orpington, Allen.)

The Lord's Prayer and the Church: Letters to the Clergy. By John Ruskin. Edited by the Rev. F. A. Maleson. (Strahan & Co.)

SOME very pleasant conclusions are enforced by the appearance of 'Arrows of the Chase.' One is that in the matter of publishing the village of Orpington is in advance, so far as taste and elegance and decent luxury are concerned, of an overgrown and disdainful London. The material design and execution of this welcome and interesting book are nothing less than artistic. The two volumes are bound in plain grey boarding, with a simple label at back; they are beautifully printed on fair, smooth paper; their edges are liberally rough; their wide margins tempt the reader irresistibly to argument and annotation. No braver-looking tomes, nor more workmanlike and serviceable, have of late issued from an English press. Evidently Mr. Ruskin's publisher is a man after Mr. Ruskin's own heart; he has done his work as well as it could be done.

Another conclusion is that the "Oxford Pupil" has the gift of editing. Nothing more careful and discreet, more diligent and at the same time more intelligent, than his arrangement and annotation of these letters can well be conceived. The illustrious writer is responsible in the publication for no more than the title, the preface and the epilogue, and the permission to publish. All the rest is the work of the "Oxford Pupil." The book was suggested, it appears, by the 'Bibliography of Ruskin' of Mr. R. H. Shepherd. On the hint contained in this volume the "Oxford Pupil" went to work, and the result of his self-imposed task, which has occupied him for more than two years, is 'Arrows of the Chase.' Out of the deeps of periodical literature, from among the shot-rubbish of well-nigh forty years of journalism, he has recovered one hundred and fifty-seven public letters, on matters of interest either imperial or parochial, by the ablest and most vigorous correspondent of the epoch. These he has arranged, not chronologically, but topically, in appropriate sections and sub-sections, each provided with its proper table of contents. At the beginning of each of his volumes he has placed a chronological list of the letters contained in it, in which he sets forth not only the date, the subject, and the source, but, whenever practicable, the place of composition also, and at the end of the second a similar list, combined and edited from the two smaller ones, of all the letters contained in the book, together with a full and sufficient index of subjects and proper names; so that his work may fairly be described as a perfect example of the art and mystery of explanatory and illustrative arrangement. As regards the notes he has contributed, they are almost painfully exact and scrupulous. The process of annotation is at all times difficult; it is not easy to hit the mean between discretion and impertinence, nor to know when to speak and when to be silent, when to stop and when to go on, when to be exhaustive and when to be merely suggestive; nor is it every one whose character presents that happy combination of enthusiasm and tact, of capacity and unmelancholy, which makes this skill and knowledge possible. And if the process be difficult in the case of ordinary men, its difficulty is increased tenfold when the subject of it is a writer so ingenious and allusive, so fertile of metaphor, and so lavish of reference as Mr. Ruskin. Assuredly the "Oxford Pupil's" task was of the hardest, and it is infinitely to his credit that he should have thus triumphantly emerged from it. Mr. Ruskin has only to talk in his large way of "the best Tintoret on this side of the Alps"; his editor is instantly at hand with the supplementary information that the work is the 'Susanna and the Elders,' now No. 349 in the Salon Carré. A picture imposingly but vaguely described as "Angelico's highest inspiration" is instantly recognized in an unobtrusive footnote as "The Crucifixion, or Adoration of the Cross," in the church of San Marco." Mr. Ruskin's description of a pre-Raphaelite landscape in the exhibition of the Royal Academy for 1854 makes it a certainty for all time that not only was there such a landscape to be seen in that year, but also that it "was bought from the walls of the Academy by a prize-holder in the Art Union of London," and that "as the purchaser resided in either America or Australia," the picture is now, in 1880, "presumably in one or other of those countries." It is the same throughout. The "Oxford Pupil" furnishes exactly the information necessary to the elucidation and the apprehension of his author's text, and of information he administers no more than exactly the proper dose. It is all one to him whether he is correcting a lapsus calami of his master's, or explaining the occasion of a certain fragment of correspondence, or reintegrating the text of a line from Wordsworth, or tracking home an unfamiliar quotation to its place in Shenstone, or verifying the date and title of a translation, or telling the name and story of a picture, or analyzing a certain state of politics. And the consequence is that the public are beholden to him for one of the best edited books it has ever been their good fortune to see.

The contents of 'Arrows of the Chase' are multifarious. Mr. Ruskin writes, and has always written, "de omni re scibili et quibusdam aliis," with better reason and a better grace than most; and as there are to be found in these volumes "the indices of everything I have deeply cared for during the last forty years," their texture is, as may be imagined, uncommonly varied. That they are wonderful reading we do not need to say. At his worst Mr. Ruskin is a better writer than most men; at his best he is incomparable. He has a magnificent vocabulary, a perfect and unerring sense of expression, a wonderful instinct of rhythm. He has much to say, and he knows so well how to say it that people are apt to value his sayings even more for their manner's sake than for the sake of their matter. It is the common lot of most of those who deal in prose to be either useful at the expense of beauty, or ornamental at the cost of serviceableness. With Mr. Ruskin it is otherwise. To him the instrument of prose is lyre and axe, is lamp and trowel, is a brush to paint with and a sword to slay, in one. A great artist in speech, he is a living and working exemplification of the theory which holds that English prose is of no particular epoch, but that in all its essentials, and allowing for the influence of current fashions of speech, it is one and the same thing with Shakespeare and with Addison, with Bunyan and with Burke, with Browne and Bacon and with Carlyle and Sterne. There are few manners in literature at once so affluent and so varied, so copious and so subtle, so capable and so full of refinement, as that of the author of 'Modern Painters.' The reason why it is felt to be so is, we take it, that Mr. Ruskin, in fact, is not only great as a writer, but great as an intelligence and a man. To a mind extraordinarily active yet capacious, extraordinarily vigorous yet subtle, to an imagination unwontedly rich and vivid and splendid, he adds the precious attributes of a noble heart, a sweet and earnest temper, and a boundless goodwill. These attributes are perceived in his work, and impart to it, however questionable its aim and however dubitable its conclusions, a certain fine and human quality of reality, which is one secret of its prodigious force. Mr. Ruskin may err, and flagrantly; but he is true to himself, and he always feels true to his readers. His influence, direct and indirect, may very possibly have been for evil rather than for good; but in intention, and his premises being granted, it has been unimpeachable. Much of his work may be futile in the end, but in the doing he has been passionately in earnest. His sagacity, his common sense, his æsthetic sentiment, may be to the thinking public as justly suspicious as is his theory of the universe to the bench of bishops, but to him they are realities; he has adopted to make them palpable all the aids that absolute conviction, coupled with a genius for expression, can lend; and we need only to have no definite point of view ourselves, or, having one, to set ourselves for the nonce at the point of view that is his, to perceive that he is right, and that we and all the world are wrong. The absolute has nothing to do with it. For the moment we are not ourselves, we are disciples of Mr. Ruskin, listening to sentences instinct with a noble veracity, now radiant in aspect and triumphant in movement as the most royal verse of Shakespeare, now serene and equable and full of import as "some golden-tongued oracle of the wise gods." If we are so minded we may Ruskinize ourselves in all seriousness, and reflect, with perfect truth so far as life is concerned, that we cannot easily do better. If we are not so minded we may pass on to other things. But in either case we have to acknowledge the writer and the man. In either case we are forced to conclude that the one completes the other, and that just as, but for the writer, the man would wield an influence but puny at its strongest and but limited at its widest, so without the man the writer, incomparable as he is, would be, humanly speaking, as perfect a futility as Théophile Gautier himself.

This being the case with Mr. Ruskin and his works generally, it will easily be understood how great is the attractiveness of Mr. Ruskin and his 'Arrows of the Chase' particularly. It is a privilege to have to do with such a man at any time and under any circumstances, and the privilege is magnified greatly when, as now, he is throughout at his best and strongest. "I am resolved," says Mr. Ruskin in his Author's Preface—a charming example of his latest manner, and a model of pure, sweet, equable English—"to pay.....several extremely fine compliments to myself, upon the quality of the text." "In the entire mass," he goes on to declare,

"there is not a word I wish to change, not a statement I have to retract, and, I believe, few pieces of advice, which the reader will not find it for his good to act upon."

Thus much for the matter of the book. Mr. Ruskin is not less definite as to the manner of it. "In the building of a large book," he says, with the wise-browed amiability peculiar to him,

"there are always places where an indulgent diffuseness weakens the fancy, and prolonged strain subdues the energy: when we have time to say all we wish, we usually wish to say more than enough; and there are few subjects we can have the pride of exhausting, without wearying the listener. But all these letters were written with fully provoked zeal, under strict allowance of space and time: they contain the choicest and most needful things I could within narrow limits say, out of many contending to be said; expressed with deliberate precision; and recommended by the best art I had in illustration or emphasis. At the time of my life in which most of them were composed, I was fonder of metaphor, and more fertile in simile, than I am now; and I employed both with franker trust in the reader's intelligence. Carefully chosen, they are always a powerful means of concentration; and I could then dismiss in six words, 'thistledown without seeds, and bubbles without colour,' forms of art on which I should now perhaps spend half a page of analytic vituperation; and represent, with a pleasant accuracy which my best methods of outline and exposition could now no more achieve, the entire system of modern plutocratic policy, under the luckily remembered image of the Arabian bridegroom, bewitched with his heels uppermost."

Nor is this all. Mr. Ruskin adds, pertinently and truthfully:—

"It is to be remembered also that many of the subjects handled can be more conveniently treated controversially, than directly: the answer to a single question may be made clearer than a statement which endeavours to anticipate many; and the crystalline vigour of a truth is often best seen in the course of its serene collision with a trembling and dissolving fallacy."

Moreover, he continues:—

"There is a deeper reason than any such accidental ones for the quality of this book. Since the letters cost me, as aforesaid, much trouble; since they interrupted me in pleasant work which was usually liable to take harm by interruption; and since they were likely, almost in the degree of their force, to be refused by the editors of the adverse journals, I never was tempted into writing a word for the public press, unless concerning matters which I had much at heart. And the issue is, therefore, that the two following volumes contain very nearly the indices of everything I have deeply cared for during the last forty years; while not a few of their political notices relate to events of more profound historical importance than any others that have occurred during the period they cover; and it has not been an uneventful one."

Mr. Ruskin concludes with one of the finest and loftiest, and at the same time the sweetest and most urbane, sentences to be found in the whole range of purely personal eloquence.

"Whether," he says, "I am spared to put into act anything here designed for my country's help, or am shielded by death from the sight of her remediless sorrow, I have already done for her as much service as she has will to receive, by laying before her facts vital to her existence, and unalterable by her power, in words of which not one has been warped by interest nor weakened by fear; and which are as pure from selfish passion as if they were spoken already out of another world."

If a preface of this sort (it is dated "Rouen, St. Firmin's Day, 1880") does not put a reader on good terms with his author and with his author's book, he is hard to please.

In 'Arrows of the Chase' the expectations raised by this excellent piece of work are not belied. There are a great many hot-headed adjectives, it is true, and a great many utterances which, "expressed with deliberate precision" or not, have nowadays a flavour in them that is distinctly comic: as, for instance, that one with reference to certain works in the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1851,—"There has been nothing in art so earnest or so complete since the days of Albert Dürer,"—which offers up Rembrandt with Delacroix, Ingres with Rubens, Watteau with Théodore Rousseau, Franz Hals with Sir Joshua, Millet with Velasquez, in one tremendous sacrifice to the glory of young Mr. Millais. But these explosions of opinion have at least the merit of being personal and peculiar, they have the right Ruskin ring, and they are interesting accordingly: as in their way, and for the same reason, are such exercises in interpretation as those of 'The Light of the World' (i. 98-103), and 'The Awakening Conscience' (i. 104-107), and the 'Notes on a Word in Shakespeare' (ii. 257-261). For the rest, there is not a letter in the book of which it can be said that it is not interesting; not one but is distinguished by the presence of some notable feature, as a touch of fine and pleasant wit, or a stout stroke of satire, or a piece of wisdom nobly thought and luminously phrased, or a passage of sonorous and splendid rhetoric, or a fling of whimsical temper. To follow their author through his many moods of irony and reproof, of indignation and of calm, of fun and suggestiveness and scorn, is, therefore, an intellectual exercise not only as agreeable as can be imagined, but as serviceable also. Mr. Ruskin, whether quizzing the Scotch, or using St. Paul and the "Powers of Heaven" as arguments likely to tell on the editor of an evening paper, or talking of the Derby, or describing the statue of Frederick the Great, or defining the public, or setting forth the limits of a scientific education, is incomparably good company. In the space of a few pages you can note that between the Ruskin of 1840 and the Ruskin of 1880 there are differences in tone and style as marked and significant as those between the Shakespeare of 'Richard II.' and the Shakespeare of the 'Winter's Tale.' In one breath you can hear him talk of war in accents like the noblest of Burke's, and in the next you may find him reminding a hapless gentleman in Sheffield that, as he has often said, "you can't have art where you have smoke; you may have it in hell, perhaps, for the Devil is too clever not to consume his own smoke, if he wants to," with the tremendous addition, "But you will never have it in Sheffield" (ii. 181). Then his theme is servants, and he discourses of them (to the editor of the Daily Telegraph) in such sentences as these:—

"Sir, there is only one way to have good servants; that is, to be worthy of being well served. All nature and all humanity will serve a good master, and rebel against an ignoble one. And there is no surer test of the quality of a nation than the quality of its servants, for they are their masters' shadows, and distort their faults in a flattened mimicry. A wise nation will have philosophers in its servants' hall; a knavish nation will have knaves there; and a kindly nation will have friends there. Only let it be remembered that 'kindness' means, as with your child, so with your servant, not indulgence, but care."

phrases that speak and sound like the utterances of an English Plato. To say that this book is the best of its year is but a poor way of putting the truth about it.

About the "Letters to the Clergy" little need be said. They were written, at Mr. Malleon's request, as prelections to the Clerical Society, on which body they were designed to act as a kind of healthy moral irritant, stimulating discussion and provoking activity. It would have been better for the "Letters" if the "Oxford Pupil" had included them among his 'Arrows of the Chase,' where they would certainly have had a more attractive environment. The volume in which they are contained consists of some 371 pages, of which but 41 pages are given to the "Letters" and but 32 pages to the "Epilogue," the remainder being occupied by Mr. Malleon's "Essays and Comments," and with the several answers from divers priests and laymen. The letters are written with Mr. Ruskin's wonted union of lucidity and charm, of grace and earnestness. The "Epilogue," on the other hand, is not in Mr. Ruskin's happiest manner. Mr. Malleon's contributions to the common stock are earnest in feeling and refined and expressive in form; he has read Mr. Ruskin deeply, and his reading has profited him much. The "Replies," some thirty-one in all, dated from several parts of the world—from Carlisle and from Washington, from Liverpool and Brighton, from Edinburgh and Tyrone and Philadelphia—are chiefly in-interesting as showing the nature and extent of Mr. Ruskin's influence. That in outward show and quality of material the volume has nothing whatever in common with 'Arrows of the Chace' we need hardly say. It is, however, the complement in some sort of that work, and they who own and read the one will certainly wish to own and read the other.

Coral Lands. By H. Stenhouse Cooper. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

Historical Sketches of Savage Life in Polynesia, with Illustrative Clan Songs. By W. Wyatt Gill. (Wellington, New Zealand, Government Printing Office.)

UNDER a fanciful title Mr. Stenhouse Cooper furnishes a sensible and rather dry estimate of the commercial value of Polynesia. There is in his volumes little of geological or ethnological speculation, a fortunate circumstance, as it would seem that these sciences are not the author's strongest points. Instead of dealing with such subjects he gives an exhaustive account of Fiji. In his anticipations of a marvellous future for these islands he is supported by the sanguine views of Sir Arthur Gordon, who about six months ago told the members of the Royal Colonial Institute that in the year after Fiji came under the British Government the exports amounted to 92,286*l.*, that in three years they had reached 192,868*l.*, and that,

"after a careful investigation extending over more than a year, it has been reported to me by most competent and most cautious scientific authority that the annual value of the agricultural exports of the colony, when its powers of production have been fully developed, will probably exceed 10,000,000*l.* sterling."

Of the aggregate of exports in 1878 not less than 122,000*l.* consisted of copra, or cocoa-nuts dried by a new process, and 18,000*l.* of sugar. As all the islands compete in these productions, and as the consumption of cocoa-nut oil, and even of lollipops, is not unlimited, it is fortunate for Fiji that her future is not dependent on copra alone. The production of sugar and of cotton seems to be capable of indefinite increase; the sugar-cane is said to be indigenous, and our author thinks that all the countries of the East were supplied with cane from Fiji. The cotton is declared to rival that grown in the sea islands of Carolina. Tea, coffee, and tobacco flourish. These assertions may be made with equal truth of other tropical countries, but Mr. Cooper contends that Fiji possesses a climate in which Englishmen can work, and that an abundant supply of cheap native labour may be obtained. We are always sceptical as to the possibility of the English race becoming acclimatized between the fifteenth and twenty-second degrees of latitude, and it is more than doubtful whether the adjacent islands, from their scant and decreasing population, can supply labour to realize such sanguine predictions. The Kingmill and the Gilbert groups are at present the chief sources of supply; the former has a population of 3,000, the largest of the latter only numbers 5,000. In many of the others the inhabitants can be counted not by thousands but by hundreds. Should the British Government follow the example the Sandwich Islands, and offer a bonus of twenty-five dollars for each Chinaman landed, the result might be different. Even without this aid the Mongolian may find his way to Fiji.

Mr. Cooper's second volume is of greater interest to the general reader. In it he tells the story of Col. Steinberger's attempt to establish himself as governor under a pretended commission from the United States. King George of Tonga opens his Parliament dressed in a uniform costing 200*l.*; the royal speech closely resembles that to which we are accustomed; a royal salute of twenty-one guns is duly fired when an excuse can be found; and his Majesty was careful to proclaim his neutrality in the Franco-German war. This Pacific power has already entered into treaties with England and with Germany. The latter entertains ulterior designs in this quarter of the world, and France, in addition to her possession of Tahiti and of New Caledonia, has extended a nominal protectorate over the Marquesas. Mr. Cooper urges England to follow these examples, both for her own commercial benefit and in the interest of the islanders, who, he declares, love the English and Americans, and dislike all other nations, more especially Spaniards. But in time of war the defence of such settlements would be impossible, they present vulnerable points, and a nation might injure its prestige without any prospect of an adequate advantage. Whatever power predominates at sea must be mistress of these islets. The white scamps who, as "Beach-combers," have polluted these Edens and debauched their inhabitants are well portrayed. The career of "Bully Hayes" and of others like him proves that civilization is not the only gift imparted by Europeans to the natives.

A residence of twenty-six years in the islands of the Southern Pacific has given to Mr. Gill a clear insight into the manners, habits, and religion of their inhabitants, and the extreme isolation of the Hervey Isles, in which our author lived, has tended to preserve the purity of their traditions; their general truth may be inferred from the agreement of narratives derived from different islands, and from the verbal accuracy with which they have been handed down from father to son.

In one respect Mr. Gill's experience leads him to differ from the conclusions of other travellers as to the future of the Polynesian race: he does not anticipate its speedy extinction. In his 'Life in the Southern Isles' he tells his readers that in Samoa, Aitutai, and other islands population is increasing, notwithstanding the ravages of disease, of intemperance, and the introduction of European clothes—a fruitful cause of diminished vitality. He tells us of the great progress of civilization: that sixty-five years ago all these islands were heathen, that now three hundred are christianized, that half a million of their inhabitants are under instruction, and that their commerce amounts to 3,000,000*l.* annually. In all probability the suppression of "kidnapping," the extension of English influence in Fiji, of French settlements in Tahiti and the Marquesas, and of German colonization in other islands, will promote the interests of humanity.

Mr. Gill is of opinion that the brown

Polynesians are identical with the Malays, as contradistinguished from the Papuans. The latter are thought by Prof. Huxley to have an ethnological connexion with the South Africans, while the former are clearly Asiatics. There is a strong similarity between the brown Polynesians in language, colour, hair, physiognomy, habits, and character. These facts satisfy our author, Mr. Whitmee, and others who have resided amongst the natives. However, Messrs. Alfred Wallace, Rankin, and other distinguished ethnologists consider that they are both Mongolians of kindred races, that they separated from the parent stock at a very early period, and that the language is essentially different.

All agree in thinking that they arrived through New Guinea, and gradually spread over Oceania, and that such a dispersion would be easy is proved from facts within Mr. Gill's own knowledge: he saw a canoe which had drifted 1,250 miles without the loss of one of its crew. Other instances are given of voyages of 1,200 and 1,400 miles. Williams, another missionary, drifted from Rarotonga to Tongatabu, and from Tahiti to Aitutai. These facts are not mentioned by Mr. Gill, although they strongly corroborate his views, and give colour to the local traditions of many expeditions from the central Samoa to various islands.

It is difficult to share his views about the colonization of New Zealand:—

"It is believed that they reached the northern island of New Zealand in safety, that the Tekaraka referred to is the veritable Tekaraka who figures in Maori story. It may be a corroboration of this that the New Zealanders at once fraternize with the Hervey islanders, and address them as 'ai tuakana' or 'elder brethren.' Besides, there is a remarkable correspondence between various Maori names and the names of places on the south of Mangaia: Mongonui, Waikato, Waitangi, Waitotara, only in the Hervey group dialect we print u for o. The pronunciation of these names is identical."

It is possible that this party of exiles in two canoes may have arrived at New Zealand, but local tradition is very explicit that at least six hundred years have passed since the first settlers arrived from Hawaiki, in the Samoan group, and that thirteen double canoes arrived, the names of which and of the chiefs who commanded them, and of the places where they landed, are all carefully preserved. The number of generations has been recorded upon notched sticks kept by their "Tohungas," the descent of various tribes being distinctly traced to different canoes.

Difficult as is the question of the origin of the present population of the Pacific islands, it is insignificant in comparison with those connected with the extinct race which formerly inhabited them. Even those small specks of land, Pitcairn and Easter Islands, the latter situated 1,300 miles from the nearest land and 2,400 from the coast of South America, were peopled by a prehistoric race, of which no record remains except hundreds of statues and images, varying from five to forty feet in height, and executed with great care. Some very similar remains are to be found at Ouzoo, to which the attention of ethnologists might well be directed. They may afford a clue to this "mystery of the Pacific."

RECENT WORKS ON PHILOSOPHY.

Unconscious Memory. By Samuel Butler. (Bogue.)

Epicureanism. By William Wallace, M.A.—
Stoicism. By Rev. W. W. Capes. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)

In reviewing Mr. Butler's 'Evolution, Old and New,' last year, we had reason to complain of the gradual decline in the literary qualities of his books. The same complaint applies to 'Unconscious Memory.' This can scarcely lay claim to the title of book at all; it is merely a collection of pamphlets bound into one volume. First comes Mr. Butler's apologia pro libris suis, a literary autobiography of some interest, in which Mr. Butler tells his readers how he came to write 'Life and Habit' and 'Evolution, Old and New.' Then he gives a translation of Prof. Hering's lecture on memory as a universal function of organic matter, which contained views agreeing with and anticipating the main principles of 'Life and Habit.' After this comes a translation of Von Hartmann's chapter on instinct in his 'Philosophy of the Unconscious,' introduced to show that the German philosopher does not agree with nor anticipate the main principles of 'Life and Habit.' Finally come some rather rambling chapters of general objections to Mr. Butler's views, in which it is somewhat difficult to discover which are the objections and which are Mr. Butler's answers. Mr. Butler, indeed, seems not to be quite conscious of the stage at which his views have arrived. It would be time enough to give the world the history of his own opinions, and of the agreement or disagreement of others with his views, when these were fully matured and had received a certain amount of verification. Mr. Butler takes as the motto of his present book an account of the first reception and ultimate acceptance of Young's theory of light. The analogy he would wish his readers to draw is obvious; but the analogy certainly does not hold good with regard to the book before us, which is a piece of work usually left for an author's scientific posterity.

What Mr. Butler has hitherto done with respect to evolution comes to this: he has put forward an hypothesis with regard to the causes of modification by descent. But he should know that the logical process is not yet concluded—he has yet to verify his hypothesis. Till this has been done, either by himself or others, no definite conclusion can be come to about its scientific merits. The general and a priori reasons he has given for his views are no doubt plausible, and are certainly sufficient to gain him a hearing; but he has no right to expect general acceptance of his views till verification by induction and experiment has been at least attempted. He has much to say about Mr. Darwin which there is no need to discuss here; but one thing he might learn from his opponent—patience and careful examination of the facts of the case. Thus one of the crucial differences between his view and Mr. Darwin's is whether instinct can be formed by habit and transmitted to the next generation. Why does not Mr. Butler set to work in order to determine this question by observation and experiment? Let him take Mr. Darwin's experiments on pigeons as his model, and if he succeeds in his verification of his own views far more will have been gained than by showing the coincidences discovered between his views and those of some German physiologist. He would do well, besides, to come to some clear understanding as to what he means by the words "conscious" and "knowledge." No doubt the verification of Mr. Butler's theories could best be attempted by a trained naturalist, but there is no reason why he himself might not do his best.

We have felt ourselves at liberty to give this advice to Mr. Butler because we treated his views as of more serious importance than did most of our contemporaries; but at the same time we were careful to point out that the value of his work consisted in the questions it raised rather than in the answers it gave. In its present stage Mr. Butler's theory of evolution is but an ingenious speculation, which may or may not be an advance on Mr. Darwin's. Even if it be the true theory, Mr. Butler can at present only claim to be a prophet.

The series describing the chief systems of ancient thought is intended to deal with them not merely as dry matters of history, but as having a bearing on modern speculation. There would seem to be good reasons why the Christian Knowledge Society should issue trustworthy manuals on Epicureanism and Stoicism more especially, for on few subjects has more been written and spoken with less knowledge. Stoicism is habitually exalted, Epicureanism held up to contempt and scorn, by many whose knowledge of either is limited to a verse or two of Horace and the modern meaning of the name. Moreover, if we regard both as moral systems, not obsolete because connected with physical or other speculations now more curious than valuable, they have their analogues in the present day—Stoicism in the writings of the Kantian moralists, and Epicureanism in those of Bentham and his followers. They therefore offer many points of comparison, and even of connexion, with modern speculation, and lend themselves readily to such treatment as the publishers of the series prescribe. But such a project on the part of a religious society involves a danger of its own. Experience has shown too often that Christianity, in expounding Epicureanism and Stoicism, is apt to dwell on the superiorities of Christianity, to the almost total exclusion, or sometimes to the distortion, of the facts relating to Epicureanism and its sister system. The professional Christian writer, in fact, appears usually to conceive himself to hold a brief, and the scientific value of his exposition suffers accordingly.

The only security against this is to entrust the various subjects to scholars of adequate learning and trained impartiality. From this point of view the Committee of the Christian Knowledge Society is to be congratulated on the choice it has made. Both the books before us are works of positive value. They go over much of the same ground, and we are thus able to compare the different method and style of treatment followed by the writers. The account of the circumstances among which Stoicism arose and of its external fortunes given by Mr. Capes is full of pictorial incident and life, and is written with an easy mastery of the subject and a fullness of knowledge which are not, perhaps, equally apparent in his exposition of the Stoic philosophy, adequate though that be. And we look in vain for anything in the account of Stoicism corresponding to Mr. Wallace's historical sketch of Epicureanism. In the latter we find due and suggestive notice of the mediæval and modern analogues of Epicureanism, whereas in Mr. Capes's book we have perhaps more about the bearing of Stoicism on Christianity than on modern speculation. We should have liked, too, to see a separate chapter devoted to a statement and philosophical estimate of the documentary sources of Stoicism, such as Mr. Wallace gives for Epicureanism. In short, bearing in mind that we are speaking of a philosophical series, we should say that Mr. Capes has written a fairly adequate account of the Stoic philosophy, together with a highly interesting and suggestive setting of historical incident, while Mr. Wallace gives in 'Epicureanism' an admirable piece of philosophical exposition. It is saying little of the latter to add that it is the best, fullest, and most impartial account of Epicureanism accessible to the English reader, since it is practically the only one.

As a commentary on the popular use of the term Epicurean, and on many pulpit declamations in which the Epicureans have figured, it may be well to quote Mr. Wallace's final summary of his conclusions:—

"But whatever it may be, modern hedonism is unlike Epicureanism, whose grave simplicity contrasts with the refinements of æsthetic emotion,—whose sober humanity puts selfish pleasure to shame,—and whose plainness of speech dispenses with the ratiocination of utilitarian systems. What Epicureanism taught was the unity and harmony of human nature; and its aim was to make life complete in itself, and independent of all external powers. Cheerfully, though gravely, the Epicurean took this present world as his all, and in it he hoped by reason to make for himself a heaven. Many things were ignored by Epicureanism. But in its frank acceptance of the realities of our human life and of the laws of universal nature,—in its emphasis on friendly love as the great help in moral progress,—and in its rejection of the asceticism which mistakes penance for discipline, Epicureanism proclaimed elements of truth which the world cannot afford to lose."

The Personal Life of David Livingstone, chiefly from his Unpublished Journals and Correspondence in the Possession of his Family.
By W. Garden Blaikie, D.D. (Murray.)

Most of us have already constructed for ourselves a more or less definite impression of the "personal life" of Livingstone. We know that he is beyond dispute, as Sir S. Baker says, "the greatest of African travellers," that as such he was necessarily a man of steadfast purpose and iron courage, and that his friendship was valued by many of the most eminent men among us. But much more than this is necessary to complete the picture of the man as he was, for his singular modesty often studiously concealed his generous actions. The motives of his journeys were misunderstood or unappreciated by those who might have known better, while the long and apparently aimless wanderings which closed the scene, following on the brilliant success of his earlier undertakings, leave involuntarily on the mind a sense of incompleteness and inconsequence. To supply the fuller knowledge which might harmonise these seeming contradictions, and to construct a faithful, consistent, breathing picture of the individual man, was the task of the biographer, and Dr. Blaikie has fulfilled it with much ability. To have withstood the obvious temptation and the many evil examples before him, and to have written one volume instead of two, alone shows a sound discrimination, which is fully confirmed by the work itself. He has made such skilful use of Dr. Livingstone's published narratives that, while delineating and illustrating by their help his personal character, he at the same time gives a clear and sufficient idea of the countries and people Livingstone visited, of the difficulties he underwent, and of the objects and results of each journey. Referring to the common charge brought against him, that he had "sunk the missionary in the explorer," Dr. Blaikie shows clearly how, partly from a naturally superior intellect, aided by a self-culture which opened to him many new fields of interest, and partly under the spur of opposition, he was gradually led further afield, and the "missionary journeyman" developed into the "missionary statesman." He may also have been influenced by the fact that as a working missionary he had achieved no great or decisive success. He had a strong feeling about shams, and the unsatisfactory and superficial character of the average converts led him to feel that a general improvement of tone was, perhaps, a worthier object of aim than individual conversion, and in the long run more effectively fulfilled the purpose desired, by inducing a state of feeling or culture in which Christianity became, at any rate, intellectually comprehensible. But while he was a working missionary he laboured indefatigably among his people, and pathetically records that the only pang of regret he felt on looking back was because he had not felt it his duty to devote a special portion of his time to playing with his children. His ideal of the missionary calling was exceedingly high, but side by side with enthusiasm we find his maxims for dealing with the natives to be founded on broad common sense, on tact and fine feeling. He recommends his brethren to combat the effect on the mind of an atmosphere of immorality and degradation by cultivating a love of the beautiful, and to enlarge their comprehension of the works of God by study of the natural sciences. According to his views, there were too many missionaries concentrated in Cape Colony, unwilling to encounter the hardships of a wilder life; and his own advance into the interior was made from no mere love of adventure or discovery (he had, besides, lately married), but from a sense of duty. When there he found himself face to face with the horrors of the slave trade, and seeing that the only hope for the people to whose interests he had devoted himself lay in its suppression, he undertook his first journey to the coast in the hope of opening a road for that legitimate trade by which alone the other could be counteracted. On arriving at St. Paul de Loanda he found himself famous; but instead of going home to enjoy his fame and recover his shattered health, he determined to encounter the fatigue and danger of a return journey to the interior, so as to escort safely through the intervening hostile tribes the natives who had accompanied him. Such was the spirit in which he devoted himself to his work. Sir Roderick might well use the story to "bring down the house" at geographical meetings, but the fame of it went further; even the negro could appreciate a man who dealt with him in such a spirit, and the deed was fittingly requited by the band of devoted followers who, when his long fight was over, carried back his body, under almost overwhelming difficulties, from the heart of Africa.

Livingstone had a great belief in humour. Its presence no doubt indicates a certain breadth of mind, and "he never was afraid of a man who had a hearty laugh." His own letters abound in it. When a lady friend remonstrated with him on his falling away from a high missionary standard, he answered:—

"My views of what is missionary duty are not so contracted as those whose ideal is a dumpy sort of man with a Bible under his arm. I have laboured in bricks and mortar, at the forge and carpenter's bench, as well as in preaching and medical practice. I feel that I am 'not my own.' I am serving Christ when shooting a buffalo for my men, or taking an astronomical observation, or writing to one of His children who forget, during the little moment of penning a note, that charity which is eulogized as 'thinking no evil'; and after having by His help got information, which I hope will lead to more abundant blessing being bestowed on Africa than hitherto, am I to hide the light under a bushel, merely because some will consider it not sufficiently, or even at all, missionary?"

The strain in which he treats even his own sufferings is as playful as it is pathetic:—

"I hope to present to my young countrymen an example of manly perseverance. I shall not hide from you that I am made by it very old and shaky, my cheeks fallen in, space round the eyes ditto; mouth almost toothless,—a few teeth that remain, out of their line, so that a smile is that of a he-hippopotamus,—a dreadful old foge, and you must tell Sir Roderick that it is an utter impossibility for me to appear in public till I get new teeth, and even then the less I am seen the better."

And side by side with such passages, without any transition, mingle acute observations on natural history or on the terrible slave trade, geographical speculations, affectionate messages to his friends or children, and thoughts on the unseen world, familiar through the intensity with which he realizes it. His letters were extraordinarily voluminous, and it is difficult to understand why the composition of his first work "tried the patience of Livingstone more than any task he had yet undertaken," so that "he used to say that he would rather cross Africa than write another book." Dr. Blaikie says he was pressed for time when writing it, and that he greatly under-estimated the natural merits of his own style, which his biographer pronounces, fairly enough perhaps, to be "clear, simple and idiomatic, well fitted to record the incidents of a journey—sometimes poetical in its vivid pictures, often brightening into humour, and sometimes deepening into pathos."

The hearty appreciation he met with on his return to England was much increased by the appearance of his book. Great cities, learned societies, mercantile associations, men eminent in various walks of life, combined to welcome and do him honour. The flattery left him unspoiled, while he laboured incessantly to enlist all this sympathy and interest in the service of the cause itself. He pointed out the great openings for legitimate trade, suggested plans for colonies, half mercantile, half missionary, on the healthy plateaux of the interior, obtained the support of Lord Palmerston and Clarendon in the form of treaties with Portugal, and returned to Africa at the head of a Government mission with consular authority. It seems hardly necessary to argue that a policy calculated not only to render possible a vast extension of missionary enterprise, but also to give the preachers a better chance of success, might be fairly classed as "missionary" work. It was, at all events, the statesmanlike conception of a master mind; but it was also a very unselfish line to adopt for one who, Dr. Blaikie says, felt the "overwhelming consequences" of conversion to every individual man. The ordinary missionary lives quietly among his people, and sees the result of his labours; but Livingstone was under no happy illusion on this head. He regarded himself as simply a pioneer; he was only to sow, the reaping of the harvest was for others. Indeed, his "whole life was a commentary on his own words, 'The end of the geographical feat is only the beginning of the enterprise.'" In tracing the gradual development of Livingstone's views, his biographer also points out how the candid and well-disciplined mind, when brought in contact with new influences, was able to divest itself of class prejudices while retaining all its simplicity. This gave peculiar value and point to his addresses to the artisan class, for whom his sympathy remained always warm. And the feeling was reciprocal. When Livingstone went with his daughter to see the launch of a Turkish frigate on the Clyde,

"the Turkish Ambassador, Musurus Paşa, was one of the party at Shandon, and he and Livingstone travelled in the same carriage. At one of the stations they were greatly cheered by the Volunteers. 'The cheers are for you,' Livingstone said to the Ambassador, with a smile. 'No,' said the Turk, 'I am only what my master made me; you are what you made yourself.' When the party reached the Queen's Hotel, a working man rushed across the road, seized Livingstone's hand, saying, 'I must shake your hand,' clapped him on the back, and rushed back again. 'You'll not deny, now,' said the Ambassador, 'that that's for you.'"

Dr. Blaikie naturally appeals on behalf of his hero to the maxim "Nosce te socia." Of the value of his scientific work we have the emphatic testimony of men like Prof. Owen, Murchison, and Sir T. Maclear; and we have, besides, abundant evidence of the strong personal regard and admiration felt for him by these and many other distinguished men. It must have been gratifying to him to have had the essentially Christian character of his work distinctly recognized by such men as Profs. Owen and Sedgwick. The letters and other testimonies quoted are throughout selected with great judgment. Prof. Sedgwick's letter is especially striking.

Dr. Blaikie relates temperately and succinctly the fortunes of the Government expedition, its substantial results and partial failure. The collapse of the Universities' Mission, for instance, reacted injuriously on Livingstone's work, and his distress at the event (for he had cordially welcomed their coming, and was attached to Bishop Mackenzie) was increased by their "trying to make me the scapegoat for their own blunders and inefficiency." His wife's death, too, at this time was a heavy blow to him, and the many touching allusions to this and other personal losses show that his feelings were deep and tender. On his return to England his popularity was unabated, and the account of his stay at Newstead while writing his book makes a pleasant episode in the toilsome life.

Dr. Blaikie gives an able and interesting résumé of the views and feelings which seem to have influenced the great traveller during his last residence in Africa. Without questioning the assertion that his intellect remained clear to the end, it is evident that the mental grasp was weakened by the protracted bodily suffering under such trying conditions. His last visit to Africa was undertaken, at the instance of the Geographical Society, to settle the question of the watersheds among the great lakes, but with the avowed intention on his own part of making his journey serve the cause to which he had devoted himself. But while no doubt faithful to this intention, he was fascinated, as his biographer admits (and who will wonder or blame him?), by the hope of discovering the sources of the Nile. He had also, unfortunately, persuaded himself—it is not clear how far his biographer sympathizes with the idea—that this discovery would be a service to religion as well as to science. Had he ascertained for certain that he was only on the Congo, he would probably have come away sooner, for "who," he asks, "would risk being put into a cannibal pot and converted into black man for it?" "It is natural," Dr. Blaikie says,

"to ask whether this question [of the watersheds] was of sufficient importance to engage his main energies, and justify the incalculable sacrifices undergone by him during the remaining six years of his life. First of all, we must remember, it was not his own scheme—it was pressed on him by Sir Roderick Murchison and the Geographical Society; and it may perhaps be doubted whether, had he foreseen the cost of the enterprise, he would have deemed the object worthy of the price. But ever and anon, he seemed to be close on what he was searching for, and certain to secure it by just a little further effort; while as often, like the cup of Tantalus, it was snatched from his grasp. Moreover, during a lifetime of splendid self-discipline, he had been training himself to keep his promises, and to complete his tasks; nor could he in any way see it his duty to break the one or leave the other unfinished. He had undertaken to the Geographical Society to solve that problem, and he would do it if it could be done. Wherever he went he had always some opportunity to make known the fatherhood of God and His love in Christ, although the seed he sowed seemed seldom to take root. Then he was gathering fresh information on the state of the country and the habits of the people. He was especially gathering information on the accursed slave-trade. But whatever might be his views or aims, it was ordained that in the wanderings of his last years he should bring within the sympathies of the Christian world many a poor tribe otherwise unknown; that he would witness sights, surpassing all he had ever seen before of the inhumanity and horrors of the slave traffic—sights that harrowed his inmost soul; and that when his final appeal to his countrymen on behalf of its victims came, not from his living voice but from his tomb, it should gather from a thousand touching associations a thrilling power that would rouse the world, and finally root out the accursed thing."

In an eloquently written concluding chapter Dr. Blaikie recapitulates the numerous measures taken for the benefit or for the opening of Africa—treaties with Zanzibar, Portugal, and Egypt; the work of Col. Gordon in the Soudan; missions established at various points in the interior (a regular post from Lake Nyassa to London now takes less than two months!); commercial and other schemes started in France, Belgium, Germany, and Italy; a vast amount of movement, traceable, most of it, directly to the energy and devotion of a single life, which, sad and unsatisfactory as its ending seemed at the time, could hardly in any other way have more effectually furthered the end to which it was devoted.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The London Casket. By Mrs. Alfred W. Hunt. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

Folly Morrison. By Frank Barrett. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

Dorothy Compton. By J. R. Henslowe. (Kerby & Edean.)

Le Clou d'Or. Par C. A. Sainte-Beuve. Avec une Préface de Jules Troubat. (Hachette et Cie.)

THE author of 'Thornicroft's Model' has not fallen short of the anticipations excited by her earlier work. Olive Brooke, the charming little girl we meet in the first chapter, who is allowed to run mentally wild in the charge of a busy medical uncle and a literary aunt, develops into an equally charming woman, though her mixture of simplicity and romance adheres to her throughout. We are afraid for her at first:—"I finished the 'Mysteries of Udolpho.' It is rather a ghastly, frightening book, isn't it, uncle? Now I want you to advise me whether I had better read 'St. Clair of the Isles,' 'Fatherless Fanny,' or 'Humphry Clinker.' They all sound nice." When she goes into the country to stay with an aunt more lax and forgetful than even the absent-minded Mrs. Brooke, she reveals not only in a miscellaneous library, but in a live hero, with whom she has childish passages of love, delightfully described, which are destined to be recalled to the minds of both in later years. This idyllic life at Austerfield soon passes, and Olive enters the world of society under the sinister patronage of a fashionable dame, her father's wife, but not her mother, who makes an unexpected descent from India on these shores, and manages, with the most amusing audacity and astuteness, to live at free quarters and enjoy the best of all society has to offer for the period of her stay. Olive passes scathless through her worldly experiences, and, having the good fortune of the offer of three not unworthy hearts, returns to her first love, the little lad of the village, who in the mean time has become a noted artist. Though the story is well sustained and has its tragic side, it is the description of female character that will commend it to most readers. The delightful unpracticality of good Mrs. Brooke, the unscrupulous diplomacy of her sister-in-law from India, the mingled suspicion and credulity which sway by turns the terrible Mrs. Ullathorne, the rich aunt of the family, are all admirably set forth. When mischievous Lady Brooke leaves the first volume of 'Cross-and-Fifty' with the last-mentioned lady in order to make a breach between her and the literary Mrs. Brooke, who has drawn the character from life, she nearly succeeds in one of the most amusing of her schemes, and the method of the enterprise is capital. Not less amusing are the doings at Messrs. Willoughby and Ambergreen's æsthetic party, when they entertain their fair guests "in faint blue and amber dresses freakishly made," who arrange themselves in sentimental curves, and look like the letter S. Ambergreen likes an artist who practises every kind of art:—"Brixton is a man of that sort. Last Monday I went in, and he was japanning his grandmother's tea-caddy; to-day he was painting away like a dragon at his 'Lifting the Veil of the Infinite.'" In a more serious style the description of Whitby, or St. Hilda's, shows the author's feeling for natural beauty. On the whole, the combination of shrewd observation with an excellent style of simple English is promising, and we hope for other novels as good as this.

Mr. Barrett's powerful story is full of strong situations, which are described with a true dramatic instinct, and which rarely lead to an anti-climax. Now, a strong dramatic situation, worked out with skill, and reaching, without transgressing, its climax, cannot fail to be pathetic; and this story is pathetic throughout, even to a painful degree. That which saves it from being too painful, and at the same time prevents it from being classed as a romance of the very first order, is that its incidents are occasionally improbable. On the stage one is less apt to demand a strictly natural and probable sequence of effects from causes; and it is evident that Mr. Barrett has written the story of the actress Folly in the spirit of a dramatic author rather than of a mere prose romancer. He may have thought of his effects more carefully than of the machinery by which he produced them; and certainly to any one who will fall in with his mood, and who can read as a spectator what has been written with the hand of a dramatist, this novel will give satisfaction of no ordinary kind. It is not over-natural that the child of an agricultural labourer, born in a workhouse, bred by the parish, and subsequently a household drudge for seven years, should pass straight from the scullery to the pantomime at Covent Garden, and there score an extraordinary success. True, she was taught to dance by a retired harlequin between the workhouse and the scullery, and, moreover, we are asked to take her as an abnormal and exceptional freak of nature. Again, it is not probable that the labourer aforesaid, having in the mean time become a maniac, should recognize Folly, whom he had never seen at all, from the gallery of the Levity Theatre, should wait for her at the stage-door, and be carried home in her brougham. Nor are the last scenes in the life of Richard Vane, an English vicar turned Communist, either natural or altogether consistent with the author's first picture of him. All this discounts the praise that may be freely bestowed on Mr. Barrett's book; and it is the more worth mentioning because such a story as 'Folly Morrison' wants but a little more finish and a little more careful and painstaking elaboration to enable it to take high rank.

Mr. Henslowe begins by telling his readers that, "ever since the Great Unknown first published 'Waverley,' and inaugurated the era of historical romance, that field has been pretty well worked." It is fortunate that the author has a better notion of how to weave historical facts into a romantic fiction than he has of the romancers who preceded Scott. Indeed, his story of "the '15" is readable enough and legitimately constructed. The fiction is a love story on the old lines. Dorothy Compton has two lovers—Randal Elliot, a Jacobite, to whom she decidedly leans, and her cousin, Dick Fenton, who is a traitor to the cause. Acting from a combination of motives, Fenton betrays his rival into the hands of his enemies; and, as Elliot makes a dash to escape, the villain of the story fires at the hero. Of course, Dorothy is in the way, and the false bullet glances aside, and kills her instead of her lover. This is a slender thread, but Mr. Henslowe has hung upon it a number of lively incidents and dramatic scenes. One of the latter, where Bolingbroke and Oxford quarrel violently in the presence of Queen Anne, forcing from her the bitter complaint that her counsellors had killed her, is full of spirit, and not without historical warrant. If Mr. Henslowe writes again, he should be more careful in his quotations. He has made a bad beginning in this respect even on his title-page. Nor do we quite see the appropriateness of decorating the cover of the book with the trinket and posy presented to the heroine by the betrayer of her lover and her own murderer.

Among the posthumous works of Sainte-Beuve are some by no means creditable to their author or acceptable to his admirers. One of these is 'Le Clou d'Or.' The volume, which is prettily printed on excellent paper, being one in form with the 'Tiphaine' noticed in these columns some weeks back, is composed of a sketch of little worth, 'Le Pendule,' and of the fragments of an unfinished novelette in epistolary form, 'Le Clou d'Or,' the heroine of which is understood to have been a real personage, and to which there consequently attaches a certain scandalous interest. Sainte-Beuve's position throughout is that of "un homme qui tire la langue—curiosité et ostentation"; the lady is described as a "timorée"; and the story is a development of this one of Sainte-Beuve's reflections: "Posséder, vers l'âge de trente-cinq ou quarante ans, et ne fut-ce qu'une seule fois, une femme qu'on connaît depuis longtemps et qu'on a aimée, c'est ce que j'appelle planter ensemble le clou d'or de l'amitié." If we add that the great artist in love, and applying his critical method to the lady's character, is a singularly unsightly object, and that M. Troubat's preface, which is part smirk and part sneer, is written in the worst possible taste, we shall have said enough of this most unpleasant and most superfluous little publication.

Ida Vane: a Story of the Restoration. By the Rev. A. Reed, B.A. (Same publishers.)
Queer Pets and their Doings. By Olive Thorne Miller. (Same publishers.)
Ferry Girl's Annual. Edited by A. A. Leith. (Routledge & Sons.)

'A SILVER KEY TO A GOLDEN PALACE' is rightly called a medley. Visions of 'Alice in Wonderland' float before us in reading of Lily, who finds her way, a little truant, into the Crystal Palace, a sixpence being her silver key. She falls asleep in a snug corner, and dreams all manner of things. Strange beasts contend together in a spelling-bee, and we think of Alice and the Caucus race. The game of tennis played with living balls is not unlike Alice's famous croquet party, and the various parodies of well-known children's rhymes are no new idea. But the vision of Shakespeare is pretty, though the affectations of the Shakespearean talk are not to be commended. The medley will probably delight many children, as is, no doubt, its object.

Mrs. Molesworth gives us in 'Hermie' another of her pretty pictures of child life. The description of school and its ways is good, but the tone of the book is somewhat sad and depressing, and the sorrows of a misunderstood child are not a very good theme for children.

The posthumous work of Robert Houdin is entertaining, but sadly incomplete. Some of its defects are well supplied by Prof. Hoffmann, the translator, the exposure of "mediumistic" tricks being instructive as well as amusing.

A book bearing the well-known name of Jules Verne needs no recommendation, but we feel that a word of caution may not be out of place. The stately progress of the steam house drawn by its wondrous elephant will delight young readers, and they will eagerly look for the promised sequel. But it would have been well if M. Jules Verne had refrained from dwelling so repeatedly on the horrors of the Indian Mutiny, scarcely a fit subject for a child's story-book.

Lord Brabourne's new book is in much the same style as his old ones. Those who liked the former will welcome a new tale by the same hand, but we doubt if they will be the majority of children.

It is possible that Mr. Hawthorne's fairy tales may please some "children of a larger growth," but it is impossible that real children will like or even understand the greater part of them. Mr. Julian Hawthorne does not seem to know what a fairy tale really is, and he has given us a series of allegories instead. A fairy tale should be natural and unconscious, without obvious moral or didactic purpose. It should take us lightly into the land of dreams which "bonny Kilmeny" once saw, and leave behind only happy impressions of that fair realm. If there be wickedness, it will be punished; if there is goodness, it must be rewarded. Deeper moral than this destroys the simple character of a genuine fairy tale. Now in what Mr. Hawthorne has written there is ingenuity, subtlety, and fancy, but each tale is as distinctly a religious, almost as distinctly a theological, allegory as though it were written by Bishop Wilberforce himself. But Bishop Wilberforce's allegorical stories were always direct to the point, and always graceful in their style, and, most important of all, always adapted to the understanding of a child. In all these essentials the stories before us are, with but one exception, singularly deficient. 'Rumpty-Dudget,' which is quite the best and most interesting, is an allegory to show how vicarious suffering will atone for sin. 'Calladon' is an allegory showing how disobedience leads to sin, then to suffering, then to remorse, and then to repentance; it is a sort of story of the Garden of Eden with a sequel. 'Theeda'—"a fairy tale for children" (!)—is an allegory of Materialism destroying Faith. And as for 'Yellow-Cap' itself, it is a perfect nightmare of an allegory, with its alternate pictures of homely virtue and hideous vice which affects and distorts the form of virtue. This 'Yellow-Cap' is quite the worst of the four stories, and we are not sure that Coleridge's well-remembered criticism of a poem which is bound to be eternal, would not be the truest criticism in this case also. One character says—and again this is a fairy tale for children—"The Seven Brethren are the outcome of an artificial civilization. It is our strength and also our weakness that we never seem to be what we are. Our laws are binding because they are irrational. Our power is great because it is an imposition. Our respectability is perfect because it is a fraud. We gain our ends because our ends are ourselves. Our union is strong because it depends on mutual distrust. In a word, we are the Everlasting Unreality! Have you understood me?" 'Not in the least,' replied Yellow-Cap. And Yellow-Cap's reply strikes us as the most sensible thing in the whole story. And now, having shown Mr. Julian Hawthorne at his worst, it is only fair to show him at his best. The fancy of the Golden Ivy, which is to overthrow the wicked enchanter's power, is extremely graceful and effective:—"A strong stem, with leaves of glistening gold, had pushed itself out of the earth, and was creeping along the ground towards Rumpty-Dudget's tower; hardly creeping, either, for it moved faster than a man could run. The cat helped Hilda and Harold to a seat on two of the largest leaves, while he himself clung to the stem; and so away they went through the forest merrily..... In a wonderfully short time the Golden Ivy had brought them to the gates of Rumpty-Dudget's tower. 'Jump down now,' said Tom, 'and leave the Golden Ivy to do the rest.' Down they all jumped accordingly, and stood at one side, near the castle gates. But the Golden Ivy kept on, and threw itself across the moat, and clambered over the portcullis, and forced its way into the courtyard, and writhed along the passages and up the staircases, until (in less time than it takes to write about it) the Ivy had reached the room with the hundred and one corners." But what the Golden Ivy does there must be read in the book itself.

For 'tis incomprehensible,
And without head or tale,

'Greek Hero-Stories' is a translation of a little volume which Niebuhr wrote in 1822 for the amusement of his son Marcus, and which the latter afterwards published for the benefit of other children. 'The Expedition of the Argo,' 'The Life and Exploits of Hercules,' and 'The History of the Heraclidae and Orestes' are the tales selected. The narrative, except in the story of Hercules, which has many good touches, is rather prosaic, and it appears that the author was accustomed in reading to his son to add many picturesque details extempore. It would be hard, however, to make such stories uninteresting. The illustrations to the present translation are by Mr. A. Hoppin, and, though often poor in technique, have a vigour and an originality which remind us somewhat of Mr. R. Doyle.

Mr. Pepper, of Polytechnic fame, provides for aspiring youth a splendid choice of experiments, and inculcates not a few elements of more permanent knowledge. The additions in the present issue are numerous and valuable.

Mr. Adams's biographies of great soldiers from Wallenstein to Grant and Moltke are good reading for older persons than boys, though boys will be specially attracted by them.

Miss Holt has attempted, with more success than usual, to draw a modern moral from the days of the thirteenth century. A good deal must of course be purely fanciful in the picture she draws of the daughter of Hubert de Burgh and her companions, but she has avoided any obvious falsification of history, and on some points, notably Jewish manners and customs, shows special knowledge.

Mr. Reed's book is not without interest, though the Plague and Fire of London are themes which have been handled before. He is more zealous than historical, and the book would hardly be placed in the hands of youth by any but a sturdy partisan. It is a curious specimen, however, of the wild work that may be made of "historical novels," especially by writers polemically disposed.

Miss Miller's collection of anecdotes of birds, beasts, and fishes will be highly approved in the nursery, and a good many of the specimens treated of will have even more novelty for English than American children.

A charming frontispiece by Miss Greenaway filly introduces 'Every Girl's Annual,' a serial excellently adapted to its readers. Miss Leith makes an excellent editor, and the volume deserves a welcome in families as full of sound and readable matter.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

THE new part of the Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, just being issued, contains papers on 'The Ethnology of Modern Midian,' by Capt. R. F. Burton; 'The Paris International Literary Congress, 1878, and the International Literary Association,' by O. H. E. Carmichael; 'Some Aspects of Zeus and Apollo Worship,' by C. F. Keary; 'A Theory of the Chief Human Races of Europe and Asia,' by J. W. Redhouse; 'Early Italian Dramatic Literature,' by R. Davey; and 'Praxiteles and the Hermes with the Dionysos-Child from the Heraion in Olympia,' by Dr. C. Waldstein.

The Merchant's Clerk, compiled by Mr. J. Pearce and published by Mr. Effingham Wilson, is a carefully written introduction to the mysteries of Bills of Exchange, Bills of Lading, Particular Average, &c., which has already appeared in a shorter form.

To Messrs. Macmillan we are indebted for a handsome reissue of that standard book, Cooper's 'Le Kœux.' The Memorials of Cambridge is a work interesting to every member of the University.—To his "Parchment Library" Mr. C. Kegan Paul has added a tasteful reprint of the Imitation of Christ.

THE first instalment is before us of a new edition of Engelmann's Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca, edited by Dr. Preuss (Dulau & Co.). There is no need to praise this exhaustive work, but the new edition gives fresh occasion for admiring the untiring industry with which the book is kept up to date. We have discovered very few omissions. While Mr. Jackson's papers on passages of the Nicomachean Ethics in the Journal of Philology are recorded, his recent edition of the fifth book seems to be unrecorded; Mr. Wilson's recent brochure has also escaped the editor; the new editions of Bernays's 'Grundzüge der verlorenen Abhandlung' and of Mr. Wallace's 'Outlines of Aristotle's Philosophy' appeared, we suppose, too late to be noted. Mr. Postgate's pamphlet on the Politics has also been passed over.

MESSRS. KELLY send us the new issue of the Post Office London Directory, one of the rare books of reference that are in every way thoroughly satisfactory. The changes made this year are not many, but they are improvements. The regularity with which such a vast mass of information is published yearly on a given date is not the least surprising thing about this colossal directory.

FIRST and foremost among the almanacs that crowd our table is the Almanach de Gotha (Gotha, Perthes), which contains a mass of matter such as places it above any other almanac. The census returns are carefully kept up to date—the reader will find the census of Liechtenstein taken in last March—the superficies of a large number of states have been carefully calculated, and at the same time the genealogies of "kings, archdukes, and tremendous people of that sort" are as elaborately noted as ever.—The Railway Diary of Messrs. McCorquodale is a very cheap publication, well suited to its purpose.—The Country Pocket-Book, published at the Bazaar Office, is somewhat luxurious, but none the less practical.

FROM Messrs. Marcus Ward & Co. we have received a couple of Calendars, one of which is excellent. The Scripture one we do not care for.—Messrs. De La Rue send us, besides the diaries noted last week, some Wall Calendars irreproachable in taste.

MR. RAPHAEL TUCK, whose prizes for Christmas Cards recently made much stir among the younger race of artists, sends us a selection of Cards of considerable excellence. They display a more than usually delicate taste.

A CAXTON MEMORIAL.

SUCCESSFUL efforts are being made to raise funds for a new Caxton Memorial, to take the shape of an illuminated window to fill the west end of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. The opportunity should not be lost, for the church, which has just been thoroughly repaired, requires the window, which if not now filled in with an appropriate subject will, in all probability, be taken up for some private family memorial.

In the parish of St. Margaret, William Caxton took up his abode when, laden with his printing materials, he left Bruges to return to his native country and become its proto-typographer. In St. Margaret's Church he went to mass, and there also the guild of which he was a member had their chapel, the records of which may still be seen in the vestry.

In most people's minds Caxton's name is associated more intimately with the Abbey than with his parish church; but this is a popular error, originating in a misconception of the word "Abbey" as used before the Reformation.

There is no evidence that Caxton had any connexion with the Abbey, nor that any patronage or favour was extended to him by the Abbot of Westminster. On this ground alone there is a singular appropriateness in the proposed place of the memorial, for he was a parishioner of St. Margaret's; there he passed the last eleven years of his life; there he was borne to his grave with more than the usual ceremonial; and there, in the parish register, is the entry of his burial.

The idea of the memorial originated with Mr. Powell, proprietor of the Printers' Register, and is warmly supported by the Rev. Canon Farrar, the rector, by Dean Stanley, and by the chief publishers and printers of the metropolis, from whose ranks an influential committee has been formed. The memorial, however, is truly national, and assistance from all quarters is desired.

The sum requisite is 800*l.*, towards which donations may be sent to the Secretary, Mr. Arthur Powell, 9, King's Bench Walk, Temple; or to the Treasurer, Mr. G. A. Spottiswoode, Great New Street, E.C. WILLIAM BLADES.

SHAKESPEARE NOTES.

With all appreciation of and deference to Prof. Leo as a known Shakespearean, I cannot refrain from the thought that his two proposed changes are of the "tame cheater" for the Falstaffian "tame cheater" type. "Wondrous" is not an attributive of "snow," but an intensive attributive of "strange," or rather of the adjective represented by "strange." As such it was and is idiomatic English both then (and used pretty frequently by Shakespeare himself) and now. "Ponderous strange" is not idiomatic, or if, as Prof. Leo seems to say, he would change it to "ponderous flakes of," such a total change admits all the vagaries of a Becket or Zachary Jackson, or the rewriting of Shakespeare altogether, and the transformation of the tragedy of 'Hamlet' into the comedy of 'Tolmah.' Not only also must the man of "weak mind and a weak organ of hearing" be discovered or rendered probable, but it must be proved or rendered probable that the two quarto copies of 1600 were both taken down by him.

As to the line III. ii. 149, no Englishman of ordinary intelligence and culture could ever be at a loss for its meaning. Possibly, if educated only in nineteenth century English, he might at first feel a little put out by the now strangeness of "join in souls" in the plural. But he would not hesitate in the slightest at "join in soul," or "in wish," or "in intent," or "in one." But as "join in souls" is a more correct expression than "join in soul," there is no necessity for a change. The "in flouts," &c., enumerated may be advantageously swept as unnecessary litter into the same dustbin with Becket and Knightley's absurdities. B. NICHOLSON.

AUTHORS AND PRINTERS' READERS.

Dec. 18, 1880.

MR. W. CLARK RUSSELL writes: "An author has some right to look for help to the printer's reader." I reply, as one of twenty-five years' experience, that an author has no such right: if an author needs help to prepare his work for the press, he has a right to provide it at his own expense, not at that of the printer. Publishers allow not a penny in the estimates for reading, which in these days of speed and competition becomes therefore an expensive luxury to printers. Proof-readers' help is only to be claimed as a right in order to detect (where possible) compositors' errors through ignorance or inadvertence. Errors through malice or prepossession are not one in a thousand. Detection is often a difficult task, through sheer inability to ascertain what was passing in the author's mind. But though no right exists, printers' readers are always most anxious to help authors, so far as duty to their employers' interests will allow it. Too often the reader's intelligent suggestions are requited with a grudging acceptance, a rebuff, an insult, a request not to make queries, or by no answer at all. A word of thanks is as rare as a big ripe gooseberry in April. As Mr. Russell confesses: "One was not always particularly obliged for these hints; but they proved care and even solicitude on the part of the printer's reader." Just so. If authors would more carefully prepare their MS. and correct their proofs without ambiguity, or else get competent persons to do it for them before sending to the printers, much trouble, annoyance, and expense would be saved to all concerned. For observe, the great cause of error is authors' own calligraphy. "Stem" for "stern," and the converse, is one of the commonest errors, due to authors' own illegibility, or assumption that printers should at their own cost employ post-office "blind clerks" of encyclopaedic knowledge—Admirable Crichtons for whom a grateful country provides no pensions when worn out or disabled. Again, corrections are often sent when too late, say for a periodical which the printer is bound to print within a certain time. If Mr. Russell's corrections were undone, perhaps he omitted to write "Revise" on his proof, as an indication that he wished to see it again. Technical information is easily obtainable. To insinuate that one word is intentionally "sneaked in" for another by a printer's reader, through a "thirst of vengeance," may perhaps appear to Mr. W. Clark Russell to be a gentlemanly action. "Still I would respectfully submit" to others than he, that the successors of Alexander Cruden, M.A., of Concordance repute (he was Woodfall's proof-reader), of M. Wright (the Greek lexicologist), and P. Austin Nuttall, LL.D.,—men in whose London Association of Correctors of the Press are enrolled university graduates, a Fellow of the Royal Asiatic Society who is no tyro as an Orientalist, an F.C.S., an F.G.S., men otherwise publicly distinguished for scientific, linguistic, mathematical, or other useful knowledge, men who are courteous and conscientious, patient and painstaking, technically competent by proper training for their semi-literary calling,—deserve better treatment as a class than the abusive epithets contained in Mr. Russell's letter in last week's Athenæum. The late Charles Dickens knew better, and gracefully acknowledged his obligations to printers' readers.

FRANCIS LYNN.

Essex, Surrey, December, 1880.

CAPT. BURTON having expressed a hope (Athenæum, No. 2771) that I shall "compel scholars to accept my system of transliteration," it may, I think, be advisable to state the two foundations on which the system is built, and also to inform you, as a matter of fact, that no competing system has appeared yet in the field.

In the first place, then, I have been able, even in the small amount of material which has been already brought to England, to make considerable use of the orthodox system of variants so well known to Egyptologists. In this there is surely nothing peculiar. In one case no less than six symbols correspond to one letter, quite in Egyptian fashion. This is itself something solid to have found.

The second part of my system depends upon the Semitic use of suffixes. Let us suppose a language of which we know nothing except that it is Semitic. It is really not very difficult, after a little practice, to recognize the roots and the formatives. As an example, I have found a certain root-word and the same root dressed in three different developments of formatives. I make out, without any doubt or hesitation, that the suffixes are Aramean, viz. the language in which part of the book of Daniel is written. Let any one find other suffixes who can. These three suffixes give me seven letters, after which progress is comparatively easy.

DUNBAR J. HEATLY.

LEIGH HUNT IN THE MIRROR.

I HAVE before me a copy of the first number of the Examiner, published Sunday, January 3rd, 1808, and with it there is stitched up a sketch of Leigh Hunt, written by himself in the year 1810, at the request of the editor of the Monthly Mirror. This memoir brings before us in a few graphic touches not only the writer who made so many delightful additions to English literature, but the man who bravely battled for the liberty of the press when to do so was to incur social ostracism and a public prosecution with all its consequences. As this sketch is no doubt quite new to many readers, and as it differs in many respects from the 'Autobiography' published some years before Leigh Hunt's death, a few extracts from it may not prove unacceptable. The details of the birth and ancestry of this distinguished man of letters I pass over as being tolerably well known. "At seven," says the writer, "I was admitted into the grammar school of Christ's Hospital, where I remained till fifteen, and received a good foundation in the Greek and Latin languages.

On my departure from school, a collection of verses, consisting of some school exercises and of some larger pieces, written during the first part of 1800, was published that year under the title of 'Jurenilla,' and in a manner which, however I may have regretted it, it does not become me perhaps to reprobate. My verses were my own, but not my will. The pieces were written with sufficient imitative enthusiasm, but that is all: I had read Gray, and I must write something like Gray; I admired Collins, and I must write something like Collins; I adored Spenser, and I must write a long allegorical poem, filled with ne's, whilows, and personifications, like Spenser. I say thus much upon the subject, because as I was a sort of rhyming young Rocius, and tended to lead astray other youths who mistook reading for inspiration, as in fact has been the case, I wish to deprecate these precocious appearances in public, which are always dangerous to the taste, and in general dissatisfactory to the recollection."

After spending some time in a lawyer's office, "studious all night and hypochondriac all day," Hunt became theatrical critic on a newly established paper called the Notes, working with an ardour "proportioned to the want of honest newspaper criticism, and to the insufferable dramatic nonsense which then reigned in public favour." For four years, 1805-9, he occupied a post in a Government office, but this he voluntarily gave up, "not only from habitual disinclination, but from certain hints, futile enough in themselves yet sufficiently annoying, respecting the feelings of the higher orders, who could not contemplate with pleasure a new paper called the Examiner, which, in concert with one of my brothers, I had commenced the year before, and in which I pursued the very uncourtly plan of caring for nothing but the truth. This paper, which it is our pleasure to manage as well as we can, and our pride to keep as independent as we ought, is now my only regular employment; but I contrive to make it a part of other literary studies, which may at a future time, by God's blessing, enable me to do something better for the good opinion of the public; and as to its profits, with constitutional reform for its object, and a stubborn consistency for its merit, it promises, in spite of the wretched efforts of the wretched men in power, to procure for me all that I wish to acquire, a good name and a decent competency."

Attacks upon himself Hunt thus cleverly and humorously dealt with:—"It is in vain, however, that I write as clearly as I can for the comprehension of the Ministerialists; nothing can persuade them, or their writers, that all I desire is an honest reputation on my own part and a little sense and decency on theirs. It is to no purpose that I have preserved a singleness of conduct, and even kept myself studiously aloof from public men whom I admire in order to write at all times just what I think. The corruptionists will have it that I am a turbulent demagogue, a factious, ferocious, and diabolical republican, a wretch who 'horrifies the pure and amiable nature' of royal personages, a plotter with Cobbett, whom I never saw in my life, and an instrument of the designs of Horne Tooke, whom I never wish to see. It is equally in vain that I have taken such pains to secure the gratitude of the dramatists. I understand they never could be brought to regard me in the proper light; and a variety of criticisms, as well as the reports of my 'good-natured friends,' have conveyed to me, at divers times, most positive assurances that I was an uninformed, an unwarrantable, and an unfeeling critic,—a malignant critic,—a bad critic,—no critic at all,—nay, a black-hearted being who delighted in tormenting—a sort of critical Rhynwick Williams who went about slandering in the dark—and, in fine,—what I must confess I really was, at one period of my life—a boy. The worst publications that attacked me I abstained from noticing, not only from a proper respect to myself, but upon the principle that their own vices had already given them their death-blow. However, they still continued fighting, like the vivacious deceased in the romance, who had not time, you know, to discover he was dead :—

Andava combattendo, ed era morto.*
Orlando lazzaro.

But you see they die off, one after the other. The process is the same, though slower, with those 'living dead men,' the dramatists : and even the Attorney-General and his right honourable friends, whose vigour consists in the persecution of newspapers, and whose genius in the waste of their country's blood, will recollect, I trust, that the inevitable hour awaits them also, and a much more serious one than can be contemplated in jest." There is the ring of true manliness in Hunt's closing sentences :—"As I began, I shall proceed. I am not conscious of ever having given praise for policy's sake, or blame for malignity's ; and I never will. A strict adherence to truth, and a recurrence to first principles, are the only things calculated to bring back the happier times of our literature and constitution ; and however humble as an individual, I have found myself formidable as a lover of truth, and shall never cease to exert myself in its cause, as long as the sensible will endure my writings, and the honest appreciate my intentions." G. BARNETT SMITH.

Literary Gossip.

In our next number, that for December 25th, we shall give a series of articles on Continental Literature of the Year. Among them will be Belgium, by MM. É. de Laveleye and P. Fredericq ; Bohemia, by Prof. Schulz ; Denmark, by M. Petersen ; France, by M. G. Masson ; Germany, by Hoffrath Zimmermann ; Holland, by E. van Campen ; Hungary, by Prof. Vámbéry ; Italy, by Prof. De Gubernatis ; Norway, by M. Jæger ; Poland, by Dr. Belcikowski ; Portugal, by M. Braga ; Spain, by Señor Riaño ; and Sweden, by M. Ahnfelt.

MR. SWINBURNE will contribute an article to the next number of the Fortnightly Review, entitled 'Tennyson and Musset,' in which he takes up the gauntlet thrown down by M. Taine.

A NEW work by Ouida, entitled 'A Village Commune,' is now in preparation. It consists of a passionate protest against the application to regenerated Italy of the Code Napoleon and a picture of the kind of oppression to which, according to the author, the peasants are now subjected. Messrs. Chatto & Windus will be the publishers.

ADJOINING the outside of the church of Stratford-on-Avon, on the north of the chancel, and within a few feet of Shakespeare's grave, were the covered remains of the crypt of the old charnel-house. When the latter building was removed, in the year 1801, the lower portion of the crypt and the accumulated bones of generations were left untouched. The new vicar, however, has not only had the crypt opened, but has transferred a load of the bones to a pit in the churchyard. When we bear in mind the number of interments in the chancel after Shakespeare's death, and consider this fact in conjunction with the local practice of removing bones from old graves into the charnel-house, the possibility of the relics of the poet being thus maltreated is not a pleasant subject of contemplation.

THE 'New Gleanings from Gladstone,' which appeared last Christmas, and had a sale of nearly 70,000 copies, is to be followed this season by 'More Gleanings from Gladstone,' by the same artist and author. The new brochure, which will be published by Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, is to have a highly finished frontispiece, printed in colours.

MARK TWAIN'S 'A Tramp Abroad' has been a remarkable success in a pecuniary sense. Though by no means cheap, it has reached its eightieth thousand in the United States, while the Canadian appropriators have sold about 20,000 copies of their reprint. In this country also the work has enjoyed a large circulation through the three editions which have been published. The Canadians have not failed on this occasion to add their contribution to the cumulative argument in favour of international copyright. They are said to have managed to get advance sheets from the steam press at Hartford, Twain's own town, and to have been in the market almost as soon as his own publishers.

MR. GARDNER, of Paisley, has in the press something which will perhaps excite interest among lovers of Burns. About twenty years ago, Mr. William Jolly, one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, met William Patrick, once a herdbooy employed by the poet at Moesgiel, and took notes of his conversations regarding the poet. These notes he has now put into shape, and the result should be interesting to Burnaites. The sketch will be entitled 'Robert Burns at Moesgiel, with Reminiscences of the Poet by his Herdbooy,' and will probably contain an etching of the original cottage at Moesgiel. Mr. Gardner will issue next week Mr. Irving's 'Book of Eminent Scotsmen.' This work has much exceeded in size the original intention, but the public will be the gainers by the delay. It is brought down to the 13th inst. The same publisher has nearly ready 'Health Haunts of the Riviera,' by Dr. R. H. Story, and a volume of verse, entitled 'Nugæ Poeticæ,' by the Rev. J. Johnston.

MR. EDWIN ARNOLD, C.S.I., is going to publish a translation, now for the first time made, of the two concluding parvas of the great Hindoo epic, the 'Mahābhārata.' The seventeenth parva, entitled 'The Great Journey,' will appear in the International Review for January, and the eighteenth parva, 'The Entry into Heaven,' in the number of the following month. Mr. Arnold's striking poem, 'The Light of Asia,' has been widely read and much admired in the United States.

MR. AUSTIN DOWSON will contribute a poem, entitled 'The Virgin with the Bells,' to the January number of the St. James's Magazine. The same number will also contain four sonnets in French by Mr. John Payne, under the heading of 'Les Soirs de Londres' ; the sub-headings being "Hyde Park," I. and II., "Kensington Gardens," III., and "To Stéphane Mallarmé," IV.

It is said that a new edition of Mr. John Payne's translation of 'The Poems of Master Francis Villon of Paris,' the first edition of which was printed for the Villon Society in 1878, will shortly be published, with such expurgation as may be necessary to render the work suitable to the general public.

THE next number of La Revue Celtique will contain a reprint of the important Irish Glossary of O'Clery, a work of the seventeenth century.

THE Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, who died at Florence on Monday last, was known in literature as the author of 'The Lives of the Lindsays,' a work deservedly of high repute as a contribution to the history of Scotland.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will publish early in the new year a selection of British ballads, old and new, under the title of 'Illustrated British Ballads,' with several hundred original wood engravings, by Messrs. Ernest Crofts, A.R.A., A. Barraud, G. Clausen, O. Green, C. Gregory, H. Holiday, W. B. Hole, R.S.A., A. Hopkins, E. B. Leighton, R. W. Macbeth, P. Macquoid, W. Ralston, W. Small, and other artists.

PROF. TRUMPF, of Munich, will shortly bring out a volume on the religion of the Sikhs.

THE Société pour l'Étude des Questions d'Enseignement Supérieur will issue from 1881 a monthly review instead of the three-monthly Bulletin.

UPWARDS of 1,200 candidates, 647 of whom belonged to the Bombay centre, applied for permission to attend the matriculation examination of the Bombay University which commenced on the 15th of last month.

THE first list of subscriptions to the building fund of 30,000*l.* being raised for the Yorkshire College amounts to 13,500*l.* Amongst the donors are the following : Edward Baines Memorial Fund, 3,000*l.* ; the Duke of Devonshire, 1,000*l.* (2,000*l.* previously) ; Sir Andrew Fairbairn, 1,000*l.* (2,000*l.* previously) ; Messrs. Beckett & Co., 1,000*l.* (2,000*l.* previously) ; Edward Baines & Sons, 500*l.* ; Mr. Edward Crossley, 500*l.* ; and Lord F. O. Cavendish, M.P., 250*l.*

THE Richmond Free Public Library, which enjoys the distinction of being the first free public library established under the Public Libraries Acts in the London district, is rapidly approaching completion. As the present possible income from the rate is only 500*l.* per annum to cover all expenses, the Committee are appealing to authors, publishers, and others for donations of books in all branches of literature.

MR. J. T. SLUGG, of Manchester, will shortly publish a book giving his recollections of Manchester as it was fifty years ago, recording the events then occurring and naming the chief actors in them.

THE Rev. J. P. Barnett, of Oxford, has been appointed to succeed the Rev. W. G. Lewis as editor of the Baptist Magazine.

NEXT January the Magazin für die Literatur des Auslandes will begin the fiftieth year of its existence by a radical change in its name and nature. In future it is to be known as Das Magazin, and will criticize German as well as foreign literature. The initial number for the new year will include articles by Auerbach, Paul Heyse, Felix Dahn, Bodensiedt, Alfred Meissner, Dr. E. Engel, and other well-known literati. Herr Meissner's contribution will be on the Heine Memoirs, Dr. Engel's on 'Endymion,' and Herr Franke will write on the Russian poets.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHN & ALLEN will publish soon the first volume of their projected "Illustrated Fauna Library of all Nations." It will be a translation of Hauff's 'Marchen,' by Mr. Percy Pinkerton.

MR. WILLIAM PETERSON, a former scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, now acting as Assistant Professor of Humanity in Edinburgh University, is preparing a translation of Cicero's 'Pro Cluentio.'

Two sonnets by Mr. Lowell, written while in Spain, will be included in the January Harper's Magazine, together with a biographical and critical paper on the poet and his works by his neighbour at Cambridge, Mr. F. H. Underwood, illustrated with a large portrait, a smaller one of the poet at thirty-six, and views of his home, "Elmwood," and of the scenes of some of his poems.

THE memorial from 567 non-resident members of the Senate of Cambridge University, expressing their concurrence with the national and other memorials in favour of granting the B.A. degree to women, is signed, among others, by the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Derby, Earl Spencer, Viscount Harbington, Lords Houghton, E. Fitzmaurice, and Henniker, the Bishops of Bath and Wells and of Carlisle, Drs. E. A. Abbott, Abdy, A. Barry, Cowie, and E. Thring, Sir D. Wedderburn, Messrs. Leonard Courtney, W. Forsyth, J. E. Gorst, A. Cohen, J. Heywood, J. T. Hibbert, A. W. Kinglake, G. Shaw Lefevre, A. G. Marten, H. J. Roby, J. Spedding, J. Westlake, Francis Galton, Profs. W. S. Aldis, A. T. Bentley, T. W. Bridge, A. S. Herschel, C. Niven, and A. S. Wilkins. Altogether the various memorials presented in connexion with this matter have been signed by or represent 10,000 persons (including numerous councils and societies which have presented memorials signed by their chairman). It is not often that a university or any body except a parliament has the opportunity of rejecting the prayer of so many and so influential memorialists. But this is to a large extent the effect of the Syndicate's report.

NOIENON

The Power of Movement in Plants. By Charles Darwin, LL.D., F.R.S., assisted by Francis Darwin. (Murray.)

It is a singular fact that while this country can count comparatively few physiological botanists, those we have had have been men of unusual eminence. Germany boasts of her physiologists, and numbers them by scores; France largely exceeds us in this particular; while in most European countries provision exists for practical instruction in this department far beyond anything we have. But while this is so, England has no reason to be otherwise than proud of her representatives. Grew and Hales may be considered as almost the founders of the science. Hooke, Priestley, and Thomas Andrew Knight largely contributed to it, while in our own times Robert Brown was without a peer—the princeps botanicorum; moreover, his physiological work will probably be in future more highly esteemed than even his essays in morphology and classification. Still more recently Mr. Darwin has stepped into the front ranks of vegetable physiologists, and by his unwearied patience in experiment and observation, his laborious research and clear statement, has contributed in no ordinary degree to the progress of the science. Hitherto he has confined himself to certain specialities, and has not given us any work of a general character, but, with the experience he must have gained and the assistance he could always command, surely no one could be better fitted to produce a comprehensive treatise on the general life-history of plants.

The tendency nowadays seems to be to treat the plant too exclusively from the point of view of pure chemistry or pure physics. The result is that we get to know more what the chemist does in his laboratory, and what the physicist effects in his experiments, than what the plant itself does in its own workshops and with its own machinery. Now it is precisely in this department that Mr. Darwin's experiments have been most valuable: he has set before us the mechanism and the methods of working of flowers; he has shown how some plants, under some circumstances, feed in a special manner by means of their leaves; he has investigated the movements of climbing plants and of tendrils. He has explained how close is the relationship between plants and animals, and how attributes once considered the exclusive possession of the one are shared also by the other.

Mr. Darwin's latest volume is an extension, as it were, of his previous treatise on climbing plants. He shows us that every growing part of every plant is continually moving round—"circumnutating" as he calls it. The movements of climbing plants, the upraising and depression of leaves, the movements of certain parts towards or from the light, all are modifications of this circumnutatory tendency. The most novel portions of the treatise are those relating to the movements of seedling plants, the upper part of which is alone sensitive to light and transmits an influence to the lower part, causing it to bend. If, therefore, the upper part be shielded from the influence of light there will be no movement of the seedling, even though the lower portion be exposed to the light for hours. Here is another experiment for Dr. Siemens to make with the aid of the electric light. Still more novel and remarkable are the facts that Mr. Darwin brings forward with reference to the movements of the radicles and minute root-fibres. These, as it appears, are in constant movement, so far as the obstacles in their way will permit, and it is easy to see of what use this rotating movement is in enabling them to penetrate between some obstacles or to avoid others. The tip of the root, moreover, is sensitive to the touch and to various stimuli, and when thus excited it transmits an influence to the upper part, causing it to bend from the pressed side. On the other hand, if the tip be exposed to a current of watery vapour on one side the upper part of the radicle bends to that side.

The bulk of the book consists of the record of a series of elaborate experiments proving the existence and nature of the movements alluded to. The experiments were made by affixing to the part to be examined, by means of shellac, a fine thread of glass tipped by a minute dot of sealing-wax. A card with a similar black dot was affixed close by, and so arranged that on beginning an observation the black dot on the glass filament and that on the card coincided in position. As the plant or part of the plant moved, while the card was fixed, the relative position of the two black dots of course varied, and the degree of variation was marked upon the horizontal or vertical glass plate through which the plant was observed by a series of marks, which, when subsequently connected by lines, represented to some extent the course of the moving object. It is probable that some more accurate and "self-recording" register will hereafter be devised; but for Mr. Darwin's present purpose, for the mere establishment of the facts in their broad outlines, this plan is sufficient. Another mode was indeed adopted by the author in cases where it was requisite to, as it were, magnify the movement. In the preparation of the work special assistance has been given by Mr. Francis Darwin, who has on more than one occasion shown a marked hereditary tendency to follow up those experimental researches in which his father has, wholly apart from his evolutionary theories, gained such well-founded repute.

Very numerous diagrams are given, but from the causes we have already mentioned, as well as from the necessary employment of a plane surface whereon to present the indications of the movements, these diagrams, as pointed out by the author, are of no value to those who desire to know the exact amount of movement or the precise course pursued, but they serve to show whether the part moved at all, and what was the general character of the movement. It is clear from this that in order more correctly to ascertain the relation between these movements to light, temperature, moisture, &c., some more accurate method of experiment must hereafter be adopted, and the apparatus by means of which the rate of growth of plants is automatically measured and recorded suggests the possibility of devising a method by which this result may be obtained.

The tendency of modern investigation has been to break down in many points the alleged distinctive marks between plants and animals. One by one the old supposed distinctions have been abandoned, so that at present the prevalent belief is that all life is essentially one, and that its manifestations are exerted through the medium of machinery fundamentally identical in character. In accordance with these views Mr. Darwin points out the resemblance between the movements of plants and many of the actions performed unconsciously by the lower animals, the most striking illustration being in the kind of imperfect reflex action which is shown to occur when a certain portion of a plant is stimulated by a touch or otherwise, the influence being transmitted from the point of contact to some other point, which, as a direct consequence of this transmitted influence, moves just as the telegraph needle moves when a current is generated in the far-off battery.

In alluding in these columns to the work of a specialist the reviewer can only point out the general nature of the book and its bearing on the main subject. Criticism on points of detail is, except to a very limited extent, out of place. As a matter of minor moment so far as the meaning intended to be conveyed is concerned, but as a point of some consequence from a literary or philological point of view, we may allude to the terms used by Mr. Darwin. For most of these he is not individually responsible, but the word "hypocotyl," to indicate that portion of the axis of the plant below the cotyledons or seed-leaves and between them and the embryo root or radicle, is a coinage of the author's own upon which we cannot congratulate him. Written in full the word should be "hypocotyledon," but as in the familiar converse of botanists the inconveniently long "dicotyledons" and "monocotyledons" are frequently shortened into "dicots" and "monocots," so it would seem Mr. Darwin has adopted the abbreviated form "hypocotyl." Advocates of verbal purity will object to this on their own grounds, while botanists will regret that another and, as we think, useless term has been adopted for what is already known as tigellum or caulicle. But this is, as we have said, a minor matter. It is far more important that a substantial addition has been made to our knowledge of the life-history of plants, and it is not altogether unpleasing to know that it has been made on this side of the German Ocean.

Inorganic Chemistry. By Dr. W. B. Kemshead. (Collins & Co.)

THIS little volume is well adapted for the students in the elementary classes of the Science and Art Department, for whose use it is professedly written. There is very satisfactory clearness in all the definitions of terms, and the explanations of the physical and chemical conditions of matter are given with great lucidity. There are few things more difficult of easy explanation than the laws of chemical combination, the atomic theory, or volume weights. Yet we find these matters rendered intelligible to the ordinary student who can devote a little thought to these subjects in a few clearly written pages of this volume. We wish we could say the same of the chapter devoted to chemical nomenclature. But this is not the fault of the author. Our modern chemists have unsettled the system of naming chemical compounds which had been long in use; they have produced a system which is in every respect opposed to the rules regulating the construction of names in our English tongue; and the whole matter is now in an exceedingly involved condition. Notwithstanding the clearness with which Dr. Kemshead has treated his subject, inorganic chemistry, he necessarily leaves it in a very unsatisfactory state. He has opened his instructive description of chemical phenomena with simplicity, and the early student can have but little difficulty in understanding him; but he is found very soon to be wandering into the consideration of subjects which can only be appreciated by, as the phrase is, "students of the advanced grade." This has arisen from the circumstance that the book has been written to meet the requirements of a certain system of examination. The author himself adroitly excuses himself for introducing the theory of atomicity and of its graphic representation on the above ground, evidently feeling at the same time that these subjects require some knowledge, at least, of the highest branches of chemical philosophy, which must be far beyond the comprehension of the junior students who are preparing only for the elementary examination. We believe the present examination system has no tendency to advance knowledge: it cultivates a dangerous tendency to "cram." Memory is taxed for a brief season; the trial being over, and the student passed, the impressions made on the mind in very transient colours rapidly fade out, and all is forgotten.

PROF. JAMES CRAIG WATSON.

WE regret to have to announce the death of Prof. James Craig Watson, who was for over twenty years Director of the Observatory of Ann Arbor, near Detroit, connected with the University of Michigan. The observatory was established at Ann Arbor in the year 1864, its foundation being due to the energy of Dr. Tappan, who raised the funds for that purpose whilst occupying the office of President of the State University. When completed, it was placed under the charge of Dr. Brinnow, and on his removal to the directorship of the Royal Observatory at Dunaink (Dublin) in 1868, he was succeeded at Ann Arbor by Prof. Watson, who had previously been assisting there, and had also been a student at the University of Michigan, although a native of Canada. Whilst at Ann Arbor Prof. Watson discovered a very large number of small planets, commencing with Euryome in 1863, and finishing with Clytemnestra in 1877, which raised the number of his planetary discoveries to twenty-two. One of these, named Juewa, was discovered at Peking in 1874, whither Prof. Watson had repaired as chief of an expedition sent by the American Government to observe the transit of Venus in December of that year. He came to Europe to observe the total eclipse of the sun which took place in December, 1870, and witnessed it at Carlentini, near Catania, in Sicily. He had previously observed the solar eclipse which was total in part of the United States in August, 1869; and his observations of that of July 29th, 1878, at Rawlins in Wyoming Territory, and the discussions which arose as to whether intra-Mercurial planets were seen on that occasion, will be in the recollection of all our astronomical readers. Prof. Watson left Ann Arbor (he was succeeded by Prof. Harrington) in July, 1879, to take charge of the new observatory at Madison, Wisconsin, erected and equipped by ex-Governor Cadwallader C. Washburn, and called the Washburn Observatory. His death took place there at the end of last month, before he had completed his forty-third year. He was born on the 28th of January, 1838, in the county of Middlesex (now Elgin), Canada West, to which place his father had removed from Pennsylvania, and from which he afterwards went to Michigan. The subject of our notice early showed his mathematical talent, and was made Professor of Astronomy at the University of Michigan in 1869, and of Physics and Mathematics in 1860. He received the gold medal of the French Academy of Sciences, in recognition of his discoveries, in 1870. As an author he is best known by his 'Theoretical Astronomy,' published at Philadelphia in 1868, which is a work of great merit, and is, accordingly, highly esteemed. He had also published a 'Popular Treatise on Comets' in 1860.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

DR. OSCAR LENZ, it appears, is not coming direct to Europe from Senegambia. He reached St. Louis on November 22nd, and goes first to Tangier, which he will leave for Berlin in January.

We understand that Miss A. F. Yule, daughter of Col. H. Yule, is now engaged in investigations regarding the physical geography of some parts of Greece and Turkey.

On the 17th of January Mr. Leigh Smith will read to the Geographical Society a paper on his recent voyage to Franz Josef Land. On that afternoon the Council of the Society will, it is said, be asked to appoint an Arctic Committee, to reconsider the whole question of the explorations of the last five years.

At a special meeting of the Marseilles Geographical Society, held last month, medals were awarded to M. Vermineck and M. Zweifel and Moustier, as the promoter and leaders of the late expedition to the sources of the Niger.

An Algerian missionary expedition is to be sent to Mwata Yanvo's country, via Lake Tanganyika. A second party of the same missionaries is to ascend the Congo, and settle on the great northern bend of the river.

Major von Mechow, who left Malanje on the 12th of June with 115 carriers and a portable boat, has descended the valley of the Camdo as far as the Quango, and having launched his boat below the rapids, he proposes to descend the latter river as far as the Congo.

The Jesuit missionaries at Shanghai have lately printed two volumes of considerable interest, one of which contains a collection of imperial edicts and the rescripts of viceroys and other officials in favour of Christianity, including also the treaties between France and China. The other volume is on the subject of the famous inscription at Si-ngan-fu (discovered in 1625), and contains the text of it, accompanied by critical remarks, &c.

Dr. F. Hirth, of the Chinese Maritime Customs Service, who has some reputation as a sinologist, has in preparation some notes on the history and origin of the word "typhoon," which has been the subject of a controversy in the East for the past ten years, some deriving it from the Greek typhōn, and others from the Chinese tai-feng, or great wind. Dr. Hirth, we understand, has lighted upon a passage in a Chinese work giving a detailed description of the wind, and calling it throughout "the wind Tai," which he suggests might be rendered "the wind of Formosa," on the ground of the prevalence of the scourge in the neighbourhood of that island. Dr. Hirth is also busy with a Chinese grammar, which will deal more especially with the documentary style used in official papers.

The Geografisk Tidsskrift publishes interesting information on Eastern Greenland by Lieut. G. Holm, the leader of this year's exploring expedition. There exist about fifteen Eskimo settlements, that furthest north being Kelalualuk, is about 66° 30' N. Some of these are only occasionally inhabited during winter. The native informant had never seen nor heard of the ruins of European buildings, but spoke of look-outs on many of the capes, and of camping grounds on the Fjelden, of whose origin the present inhabitants know nothing.

M. d'Arnaud, who led two expeditions to the Upper Nile in 1840-42, is about to publish the large map (1:500,000) which resulted from his explorations. This publication, though somewhat tardy, will nevertheless be hailed with satisfaction by geographers; for although the Nile has for several years past been navigated by steamers, even beyond the "furthest" reached by the memorable expeditions despatched by Mehemet Ali, it has never been carefully surveyed. M. d'Arnaud, in a paper read before the Paris Geographical Society, points out that his map gives the original nomenclature of the country, since superseded in a large measure by Arabic designations. It also shows the former extent of Lake No, at the confluence of the Bahr el Ghazal with the Bahr el Gebel, or Upper White Nile.

The Portuguese Government has determined upon founding agricultural colonies of Europeans in Angola, and the customs' duties levied upon wine and spirits are to be set aside for that purpose. A loan of 1,000,000*l.*, to be repaid by the African colonies, is to be raised for the construction of roads and public works; and in order still further to show the interest which the home Government takes in the colonies, Don Carlos, the Crown Prince, will pay them a visit, attended by the Minister of Marine.

M. Alph. Milne Edwards contributes to the Annales des Sciences Naturelles a most valuable memoir, 'Recherches sur la Faune des Régions Australes.' This is a careful examination of all that has been done by the various expeditions sent from England and from America towards the exploration of the glacial Antarctic Ocean. It is not completed in the present volume, but will be continued in the next.

We have received Mr. Wyld's 'Map of the Gold-fields of Southern India' (1: 169,000), which has been produced under the supervision of Mr. Brough Smyth, and appears to be trustworthy. It very distinctly exhibits the gold reefs and washings in Wynnad and the Neilgherry Hills, and is to be followed by similar maps illustrating the other gold-bearing regions of India.

This comet discovered by Prof. Swift at Rochester, N.Y., on October 10th, and afterwards found to be identical with Comet III., 1869, is now receding rapidly from the earth and becoming continuously fainter. The perihelion passage took place on November 8th, the nearest approach to the earth on November 17th. The first European observations of it at this return appear to have been made by Herr Block at Olema, on the 26th and 31st of October; the last observation hitherto published was made at Kiel on the 2nd inst. by Dr. C. F. W. Peters. Winnecke's periodical comet (first discovered by Pons in 1819, and reckoning as Comet III. of that year) passed its perihelion on Saturday, the 4th inst., but its position at this return is exceedingly unfavourable for observation. If seen at all, it must be at more southern latitudes in the last week of this or the first week of next year, an interval about which time Prof. von Oppolzer, who has calculated an ephemeris (published in Astronomische Nachrichten, No. 2326), remarks that there will be offered a slight glimmer of hope ("einen kaum berechtigten Hoffnungsschimmer") of observing the comet. The next return, however, in the year 1886, will occur under much more favourable circumstances. As we are now within a "measurable distance" of 1881, it may be mentioned that two of the known periodical comets will return to perihelion during the course of it. The first of these is Faye's, which is due in perihelion on the 22nd of January, but, as we have already remarked, the nearest approach to the earth took place some time ago; the comet has been well observed, and is not likely to be seen again at this return after the present month, or perhaps (with the best telescopes) in the first week of January. The other comet returning next year is the well-known and highly interesting one called Encke's, which will pass its perihelion in November. The last passage occurred on July 26th, 1878. At that return it was only observed, we believe, by Mr. Tebbutt, of Windsor, New South Wales, and by Dr. Gould and Mr. J. M. Thorne at Cordoba, the last-named gentleman following it until the 6th of September. This comet has been observed at every return since the first predicted one in 1822.

There will be a partial eclipse of the sun, visible in Western Europe, on the last day of the present year (at Greenwich beginning at 1^h 40^m, and ending at 3^h 28^m in the afternoon); and next year a partial eclipse, visible in North-eastern Asia and North-western America, on May 27th, and an annular eclipse, visible only on land in the southernmost part of South America and the adjacent islands (and that only as a partial eclipse, the central line being confined within the Antarctic circle), on the 21st of November. There will also occur in 1881 a total eclipse of the moon on the 12th of June, to be seen best in South America, and a large (almost total) one, visible wholly or in part over a great portion of the eastern hemisphere, on the 5th of December; also a transit of the planet Mercury over the sun's disc on the 7th of November, not to be seen in Europe, but most favourably in Australia and the adjacent islands.

We have received the Memoirs of the Italian Spectroscopical Society for June, July, and August, containing the continuation of the solar observations of Prof. Tacchini at Rome, and of Prof. Riich at Palermo, up to the end of June. The number for July has, besides, a description by Prof. Riich of the remarkable metallic solar eruption observed on the 31st of that month, which was seen also by the Rev. J. G. Hickley at Walton Rectory, near Bridgwater, and is briefly described by him in the Observatory for September. And in the number for August is a paper by Prof. Tacchini on those curious phenomena observed with the spectroscope on various occasions near the sun's limb by Mr. Trouvelot, who denominated them fugitive spectra, and came to the conclusion that their origin was solar or cosmical—a view which Prof. Tacchini here gives reasons from his own observations for not being able to accept, and for ascribing a terrestrial origin to the appearances in question.

The Nautical Almanac for 1884 has been published; its contents and arrangement are the same generally as in preceding years. The sun's equatorial horizontal parallax at the earth's mean distance is still taken as 8".848. The moon's places are again given as altered from those computed from Hansen's Tables by Prof. Newcomb's corrections, the amount of correction so applied to the longitudes and latitudes respectively being set down in a small table at the end of the Almanac. There will be three partial eclipses of the sun in 1884, all invisible at Greenwich, and two total eclipses of the moon, one of which, on October 4th, will be visible at Greenwich. Places of stars are given which are convenient to be observed with Mars near its opposition at the end of January; the planet will be at the time at high northern declination. The Almanac contains, as usual, a list of the best available determinations of the latitudes and longitudes of the principal observatories, both English and foreign.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Dec. 9.—J. Evans, Esq., Treasurer, in the chair.—The Bishop of Limerick and Prof. Asa Gray (Foreign Member) were admitted into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'On a Simplified Form of the Torsion Gravimeters of Brown and Babinet,' by Major Herschel.—'Note on the Microscopic Examination of some Fossil Wood from the Mackenzie River,' by Mr. C. Schuster.—'Electrostatic Capacity of Glass, &c.,' by Dr. Hopkinson.—and 'On the Cochlea of the Ornithoglycus platypus compared with that of ordinary Mammals and of Birds,' by Dr. V. Pritchard.

ASTRONOMICAL.—Dec. 10.—J. R. Hind, President, in the chair.—Mr. E. Simpson-Bailey and Col. H. T. Rogers were elected Fellows. Mr. Ranyard read a paper 'On the Velocity of Gaseous Matter projected from the Sun.' On the 7th of October Prof. C. A. Young observed a prominence, which at 11.30 A.M. had reached a height of 8' above the sun's limb, and before noon it had extended to a height of over 13', an altitude altogether unprecedented in the history of the observations of solar prominences. Supposing the prominence to have risen vertically from a part of the photosphere upon the sun's limb, and not to have been foreshortened, the matter of the prominence must have risen from an altitude of 212,500 miles to an altitude of 345,300 miles above the photosphere in less than half an hour. Mr. Ranyard calculated that a projectile thrown vertically upwards under the influence of solar gravity, and unchecked by a resisting atmosphere, would occupy 36 min. 35 sec. in passing from an altitude of 8' to an altitude of 13'; and he consequently argued that the gaseous matter of the prominence must have been thrown up within a resisting medium, so that its initial velocity must have been greater than that which would have been necessary to carry matter in free space to an altitude of 13'. The question of the existence of a resisting atmosphere in the region of the corona is one of considerable interest, not only in connexion with solar physics, but also in connexion with comets, several of which are believed to have passed when at perihelion within a distance of a solar radius from the photosphere.—Dr. Gould gave an account of the zone observations on which he has been occupied at Cordoba during the last ten years. He has observed the places and magnitudes of the stars in a series of zones extending from 23° south declination to 80° south declination. The work was commenced by Bessel, and carried on by Arrhenius down to the thirty-first parallel of south declination. Dr. Gould's observations are not merely relative observations, but the astronomical constants and the instrumental constants have been separately determined for each series of zone observations. During his stay at Cordoba he has succeeded in obtaining photographs of some thirty or forty clusters in the southern heavens; many of the plates show stars down to the ninth magnitude.—Mr. Hind read a letter, which will be published in the Monthly Notices, with respect to a uniform code for transmitting telegraphic messages with respect to astronomical discoveries.—Mr. Marth read a note on an ephemeris which he had constructed for the satellites of Uranus. It appears that the earth will cross the plane of the orbits of the satellites about October 1st, 1881. The earth will remain upon the other side of the plane till March, 1882, and in July, 1882, it will finally pass to the other side of the plane, where it will remain till 1923. Valuable observations may be made at the time when the earth is passing through the planes of the orbits for determining the elements of the orbits of the satellites.—Mr. Christie showed a diagram of a remarkable absorption spectrum of a solar spot which he had recently observed at Greenwich. It contained eighteen broad lines between the region of the B and the F line, none of which appeared to correspond with the lines of any of the terrestrial elements.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—Dec. 1.—Sir J. Lubbock, President, in the chair.—Mr. Pascoe exhibited a large series of Arctus hirtus from Peru, to show the extreme variability of the elytral markings in this species.—Mr. Lillups exhibited four species of Psocidius new to Britain, viz., P. Mulleri, P. juvenilis, P. intermedius, and P. incertus; and also exhibited twenty species of Coleoptera found in a small parcel of corn refuse.—The President exhibited two specimens in alcohol of a species of Phanidius, forwarded by a correspondent in St. Vincent.—Mr. Canham exhibited a specimen of Tacharia ganadella, a species of Ticuna new to Britain; and also a remarkable variety of Cidaria rufata.—Mr. J. Scott communicated a paper 'On a Collection of Hemiptera from Japan.'—Mr. C. O. Waterhouse read a paper entitled 'Description of a New Species of the anomalous Genus Polycetes,' and exhibited a diagram illustrating the structure of this insect.

MICROSCOPICAL.—Dec. 8.—J. Glaisher, Esq., in the chair.—Eight new Fellows were elected.—A paper by Dr. Hudson was read on a new Ecites (Janus) and a new Floucularia (trifolium), found by Mr. Hood, of Dundee, in Loch Laidie. The trochal disc of the former formed a link between that of Melicesta and Ecites. The latter was remarkable in having only three lobes, and being much larger than any Floucularia hitherto known.—Mr. Stewart explained some peculiar structural features of the Rehinouetridæ, illustrated by specimens and drawings.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Dec. 13.—The fourth of the present course of Cantor Lectures on 'Some Points of Contact between the Scientific and Artistic Aspects of Pottery and Porcelain' was delivered by Prof. Church. The subject of the lecture was the history and artistic development of soft paste porcelains, European and Oriental.

Dec. 15.—Prof. J. Tyndall in the chair.—A paper 'On the Use of Sound for Signals' was read by Mr. R. P. Edwards.

INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—Dec. 13.—J. Whichever, Esq., President, in the chair.—The following communication was read: 'Remains of Roman Buildings, near Brading, Isle of Wight,' by Messrs. J. E. Price and F. G. H. Price.

MATHEMATICAL.—Dec. 2.—S. Roberts, Esq., President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. R. Roberts and R. A. Roberts were elected Members.—The following communications were made: 'Note sur la Dérivation des Déterminants,' by Prof. Teixeira (Coimbra, Portugal).—'Solution of the Equation $x^2 - 1 = 0$,' by Prof. Cayley.—'A General Theorem in Kinematics,' by Prof. Minchin.—'On the Solution of the Inverse Lagrangian Problem,' by Mr. W. B. Grove.—'Motion of a Viscous Fluid,' by Mr. T. Craig.—and 'On the Spherical Capacity of a Conductor bounded by Two Spherical Surfaces cutting at any Angle,' by Mr. W. D. Niven.

FOLK-LORE.—Dec. 10.—The Right Hon. Earl Beauchamp, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. J. Fenton, entitled 'The Birth of a Deity; or, the Story of Unkulunkulu.' Unkulunkulu is the Zulu word for a great-grandfather, but its meaning had expanded until it meant any ancestor of a family or tribe. In course of time the Zulus evolved a kind of cosmogony, accounting for the existence of the world and the creation of man. This involved the conception of a first man, and Unkulunkulu became gradually connected with this conception, until from meaning 'great-grandfather' it came to be almost exclusively the personal name of the first man. Simultaneously the Zulus had conceived the idea of a lord in heaven to whom they prayed for rain on the crops. Gradually Unkulunkulu the first man became identified with the lord in heaven. But the fusion was incomplete, and Unkulunkulu was therefore a transitional form between humanity and deity, and in this lay his value to us, transitional forms of species being, as Mr. Darwin had found, very rare.—Bishop Callaway differed from the author of the paper as to the identification of Unkulunkulu with the heaven-father of the Zulus.—Dr. E. B. Tylor thought perhaps the traditions of the Zulus were hardly yet perfect enough to make a thoroughly satisfactory comment, but pointed out that the argument of the author was advanced by a nearly parallel legend in Brazil. Dr. Tylor took the opportunity of asking Bishop Callaway about the completion of his work on Zulu folk-lore.—The Bishop, after giving some specimens of his MS. collection, which relate to the medical charms of the Zulus, expressed a hope that he would be able to publish it soon.—The President pointed out that the English grandfather, great-grandfather, &c., was an exact, and he believed the only, parallel of the Zulu reduplication in the name Unkulunkulu.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Dec. 6.—S. H. Hodgson, Esq., President, in the chair.—A paper on 'Hobbes' was read by Mr. E. Clarkson.

ENGLISH SPELLING REFORM ASSOCIATION.—Dec. 14.—Mr. A. J. Ellis in the chair.—Mr. Sweet opened a discussion on the expediency of recommending for immediate adoption some partial changes in the existing spelling. Mr. Sweet gave a brief sketch of the reasons which had led to the idea of a partial reform as the first step towards a complete reformation. He went seriatim through his proposals, which were freely criticised, but eventually generally accepted by the meeting.—The Chairman said that he could only regard the proposals as a sop given to Cerberus to encourage him to swallow more. As a preparatory step he approved of them; but he hoped no one would regard them as at all final.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. London Institution, 8.—Growth from the Egg. Prof. B. Day.
 — Lankaster.
 — Aristotelian 8.—Spinoza. Mr. J. Pease.
 — Society of Arts, 8.—Some Points of Contact between the Scientific and Artistic Aspects of Pottery and Porcelain. Lectures by Prof. A. H. Church (Chairman).
 Tues. Sociological, 11.—The Reduction of the present Postal Telegraph.
 — Tenth Mr. R. P. Williams.
 — Civil Engineers, 8.—Annual Meeting.
 Wed. Telegraph Engineers, 8.—Annual Meeting.
 — Literature 9.—Picture from the Life of St. Guthrie, a Twelfth Century Monk in the British Museum. Mr. W. de Grey.
 Thurs. London Institution, 7.—A. B. Barry, Esq., Mr. W. E. S. Baines.

Science Society.

The list of Fellows deceased read at the anniversary meeting of the Royal Society on the 30th ult. shows a heavy mortality among the veterans within the preceding twelvemonth. Commencing with the least aged, we find J. R. Napier, 58, followed by the sexagenarians, Sir B. O. Brodie, 63; Dr. Lockhart Clarke, 64; D. T. Ansted, 66; Dr. W. Budd, 68; E. W. Cooke and Dr. A. J. Stephens, each 69. In the next decade appear Dr. A. S. Taylor, 74; Dr. Guest and Dr. Sharpey, each 78; and Prof. W. H. Miller and Lord Belper, each 79. The octogenarians are Lord Hampton and Mr. Lassell, each 81; and Mr. T. Bell, Sir W. Erle, Rev. H. P. Hamilton, and Sir John Macneill, each 87. And the year's necrology ends with Mr. Chicheley Plowden, aged 93. Sir Edward Sabine, now in his ninety-second year, is the father of the Society.

A MEETING of the Mineralogical Society of Great Britain and Ireland will be held at the Museum of Practical Geology on Thursday next, at eight o'clock P.M. The chair will be taken by the President, Prof. Forster-Heddele.

DAGUERRE, the discoverer of the photographic process which bears his name, which he reported to the world in January, 1839, was photographed by Mr. Mayall in 1846. This interesting portrait has been printed in Woodburytype, and forms the frontispiece of the 'Year-Book of Photography' for this year.

The volume of Abhandlungen for 1879, just published by the Royal Academy of Sciences, Berlin, contains, in the physical section, the second part of Rammelsberg's paper 'On the Chemical Nature of Meteorites,' a contribution by Roth to the 'Petrography of Plutonic Rocks,' and one by H. Virchow 'On the Landeskunde of the Troas.' In this last the question of the site of ancient Troy is shown to be intimately connected with the relations between the land and sea, mountain and plain, and rivers and springs of the district. In the philosophic-historical section there are papers on the Kitai and Karakitai, as bearing on the history of Eastern and Inner Asia; on archaic bronzes from Olympia; on the ordinal numbers of the Mexican language, and an argument on the moral principle of Kant.

THE Prince of Wales is spoken of as the probable President of the Congress of Electricians and the Exhibition of Electrical Apparatus, Machinery, and Lights, which will be opened at the Palais de l'Industrie, Paris, on the 1st of August, 1881, and will close on the 15th of November.

THE Rev. Taliesin Jones, of Rhymney, brought before the South Wales Sliding Scale Committee on the 8th inst. a scheme, which he says has occupied him experimentally for five years, for preventing explosions in coal-mines. Some material is distributed through a colliery which is said to decompose the gas escaping from the coal, and thus render fiery collieries workable with naked lights. Arrangements were made to test these experiments in one of the collieries in the Rhondda Valley. A sad corollary to this is the explosion on the morning of the 10th at one of the most important collieries in this valley, by which upwards of one hundred men were killed.

PROF. MORRIS, of the Stevens Institute, America, has examined and described a new electric lamp, the invention of H. S. Maxim. It consists, like Edison's and Swan's, of a carbonized fibre, but this is placed in a globe containing gasoline vapour. When the electric current passes through the fibre it decomposes the gasoline, and freed carbon is deposited upon and strengthens the fibre, increasing the light.

THE death of Prof. Rymer Jones, the well-known naturalist and physiologist, is announced.

M. PANCHON reported to the Académie des Sciences on November 24th the continuation of his experiments on the influence of light on the growth of plants. His experiments with the seeds of the castor-oil plant proved that more carbonic acid was exhaled in darkness than in light. Those with the haricot bean gave a contrary result.

A LIST of the flowering plants of Dumfriesshire and Galloway is being prepared under the direction of the Antiquarian and Natural History Society of Dumfries. This will form the first portion of a proposed scheme covering the entire Fauna and Flora of the district, and will, we believe, appear in the next biennial volume of the Society's Transactions.

FINE ARTS

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.—WINTER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN From Ten to Five Daily, at the Suffolk Street Galleries, Pall Mall West.—Admission, 1s. THOS. MOORE, Secretary.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE NINETEENTH WINTER EXHIBITION, including a Loan Collection of Works by the late George Deacon, is NOW OPEN at Pall Mall West, from Ten till Five. ALFRED D. FAIRF, Secretary.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE FIFTIETH WINTER EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN From Ten till Five Daily, at Pall Mall, S.W. H. F. FAIRF, Secretary.

EXHIBITION OF CABINET PICTURES IN OIL.—Daily Gallery, Regent Hall, Piccadilly.—THE FORTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION. Open daily, from Ten till Six.—Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d. R. F. FAIRF, Secretary.

THE SIXTEENTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS is NOW OPEN at THOMAS M'LEAN'S Gallery, 7, Haymarket, next the Theatre.—Admission on presentation of Address Card.

HANOVER GALLERY, 57, New Bond Street. Entrance from Maddox Street.—NOW OPEN, the WINTER EXHIBITION of OIL PAINTINGS by English Artists, and of Original Drawings and Sketches published by French.—Lighted at Day.

DON'TS GREAT WORKS.—CHRIST LEAVING the FLEET.—CHRIST ENTERING JERUSALEM.—each 25 by 25 inch, with 'Dream of Plato's Wife.' Soldiers of the Cross. 'A Day Dream.' 'Rainbow Landscape.' Loch Garry, Scotland, &c., at the DON'TS GALLERY, 55, New Bond Street. Daily, Ten to Six.—1s.

Ilios: the City and Country of the Trojans: the Results of Researches and Discoveries on the Site of Troy and throughout the Troas in the Years 1871-3, 1878-9, including an Autobiography of the Author. By Dr. Henry Schliemann, F.S.A. With a Preface and Appendices and Notes by Prof. R. Virchow, Max Müller, &c. (Murray.)

(Second and Concluding Notice.)

IF this book enables us to verify the familiarity of Homer with the Troas, it also helps us to realize how very remote in origin must have been the traditions of the city of which he sang the ruin. The hill of Hisarlik, which became the acropolis of the later Greek city of Ilium, was first recognised as the most reasonable claimant to be the site of Troy by O. Maclaren in 1822, in his 'Dissertation on the Topography of the Plain of Troy,' and his views were adopted by Grote in 1846, and Dr. L. Schmitz in 1857, and, sooth to say, deserved reception generally. However, the long list of advocates for the impossible Bonnarbashi includes such authorities as Col. Leake, 1824; Field-Marshal von Moltke, 1835; F. G. Welcker, 1844; Kiepert, 1854; Ernst Curtius, 1871-74. The vast operations of Dr. Schliemann in excavating the hill have brought to light a most surprising history. Fifty-three feet of ruins and made ground cover the remains of the first occupation, and between this and the Macedonian ruins at the summit were interposed the stratified ruins that testified to as many as five other distinct occupations. Thus are made out the seven cities of Schliemann, and the phrase is justified by what we know of the limited extent of the original fortresses that grew into Rome and Athens. The first two settlements are witnesses for a copper age anterior to the knowledge of bronzes, but, strange to say, the examples of pottery most advanced in fabric and shape and with inlaid patterns were found in this most ancient settlement, and the only gilded object found at all. The pottery, however, was all baked at open fires, and is hand made, with the exception, it is said, of some small vessels clearly wheel made. We confess that we should wish for very precise verification of these exceptions; at this day the Kabyles of Algeria produce remarkable pottery, exclusively by hand, with such truth of line as to sometimes defy anything short of a close scrutiny. The second city had certain walls of defence, and the third more important still. This is the 'Burnt City'—the city of the golden treasures—Ilios. In comparison with it the remains of the two that succeed it are unimportant; but between these and the seventh occupancy, where remains of archaic Greek pottery are mingled with late Greek work, was interposed a settlement of some population which left behind pottery contrasting with all that had gone before, and analogous to archaic Etruscan, but still generally handmade. On a review of the remarkable series of objects rescued by Dr. Schliemann from the third city, and of his description of the ruins, especially as compared with the comments of Dr. Virchow, it becomes clear that this fortified settlement has the best claim, and has sufficient title to be considered as having furnished the basis for the story of the prosperity of the rulers of the plain of Troy and their destruction by enemies. It is certainly astonishing to find how truthfully legend has clung to the fact, so strongly attested by the ruins, that when Ilium fell it was involved in a tremendous conflagration. This is foreshadowed in the Iliad, where the river Xanthus is tormented by the fire of Hephæstus until he promises that when Troy shall be in flames he will not contribute a drop of water to quench them; and the description of the fire in Virgil was prompted by the Greek cyclic poems, to which he owed so much else.

"Here was a great devouring fire, in which the clay walls of the buildings were molten, and made fluid like wax, so that congealed drops of glass bear witness at the present day to the mighty conflagration. Only at a few places are cinders left whose structure enables us still to discover what was burnt—whether wood or straw, wheat or pease—almost the whole is burnt to ashes."

Honestly, and yet not without a natural pang, Dr. Schliemann recognizes that the Troy of his early imaginations is in ruins as utter as any that he has excavated; yet he may well take comfort in the consciousness of having cleared the Homeric question for all time of embarrassments that have long retarded the appreciation of the poetry, either as poetry or as in itself an historical monument of the time intermediate between legendary and strictly historical Hellas.

"I wish," he says, "I could have proved Homer to have been an eye-witness of the Trojan war! Alas, I cannot do it! At his time swords were in universal use and iron was known, whereas they were totally unknown at Troy. Besides, the civilization he describes is later by centuries than that which I have brought to light in the excavations. Homer gives us the legend of Ilium's tragic fate as it was handed down to him by preceding bards, clothing the traditional facts of the war and destruction of Troy in the garb of his own day. My excavations have reduced the Homeric Ilium to its real proportions."

It is certainly remarkable that the relics of the "Burnt City" of the Troad favour in the most significant manner a synchrony with the graves in the acropolis of Mycenæ—all theory as to the identification of Agamemnon apart. The grand characteristic of the absence of iron is common to both, while bronze is abundant. A double-edged bronze hatchet, at p. 606, is the very counterpart of the Mycenaean. A pair of gold discs, again, with star-flowers within circles, correspond with Mycenaean examples very accurately. Still more remarkable is the exact agreement in pattern and construction of the gold tubes with attached spirals, Nos. 836, 838, and 853, with the objects, Nos. 297 and 299, found at Mycenæ; these are so peculiar that they must needs be derived from the same antecedents. On the other hand, no example occurs at Ilium of the proper Mycenaean treatment of the spiral, which is continued from the gold ornaments and tombstones of the acropolis of Mycenæ to the decorations of the treasures of much later date; this consists in combining two, or even three, spirals about a common centre and making the lines of two at least continuous, as if doubling round a central pin.

We have said nothing of those curious and abundant objects the "owl-head vases," vases which exhibit female breasts, sometimes arms, sometimes ears, but of which the conspicuous features are goggle eyes below strongly marked brows, and on either side of what is merely typical if taken as a nose, and scarcely less so if, from the uniform absence of any indication of a mouth, we agree with Dr. Schliemann to interpret it as a bird's beak. Be it enough here to remark that this symbol appears fully developed in the second city, and is found in abundance in the third, while that it is continued through its two successors proves the tenacity with which the original stock of the population of this district clung to the hill of Hisarlik, a tenacity which it is as reasonable to ascribe to religious associations as to any particular advantages that it offered for a defensible post.

Enough has now been said to indicate the value of this handsome and well-arranged work; and the index, it may be added, is a model of what an index ought to be. The book introduces the reader to new fields of speculation, whether as scholars or pure antiquaries, and for these particular fields, by the very nature of the case, it must remain the established guide. We may refer those who are still eager for more detailed scientific guidance as to the natural characteristics and changes of this renowned region to Prof. Virchow's 'Beiträge zur Landeskunde der Troas,' in the volume of Transactions of the Berlin Academy recently published.

ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

The Itchen Valley from Titchborne to Southampton (Seeley, Jackson & Halliday) contains twenty-two etchings by Mr. H. Sumner, representing with great care, frequent brilliancy, and constant originality as many pretty scenes in the course of one of the prettiest rivers in England. Mr. Sumner is not content to be topographically correct. He studies with exemplary patience and keen zest for nature the difficult and ever-varying effects of light, as in the charmingly true delineation of autumn evening, just after sundown, on 'Alresford Pond,' where the character of the illumination has been reproduced with such extraordinary success that we almost see the colour and absolutely possess the mystery of the gorgeous twilight and its reflections on the meadow and the water. The sky is very luminous. Hardly less fortunately faithful, and not less poetical in its truth, is the scene 'Near Avington,' where the landscape vanishes in a dimmer twilight than that which glows in the other print. It is impossible not to admire the excellent 'Winchester,' a vaporous effect on a snow-covered land. Mr. Sumner's power of dealing with light and its effect on diverse surfaces, colours, and substances is very happily shown in 'The Lady Chapel' of Winchester Cathedral; but here we miss that solid draughtsmanship and firmness which architecture demands. Very lustrous is 'The Soke Bridge,' where water and old buildings glow in full sunlight, and have an equal charm to that which is displayed in 'Royal Oak Passage,' distinguished as that etching is by means of its solidity and richness of local "colour." 'St. Catherine's

Hill' has a tenderness of tone and subtly differentiated solidity of its parts which are charming in artistic eyes. Regretting that we cannot name all the etchings in the book, we heartily commend it to artists and lovers of the mysteries of light, shadow, and tone. A pleasant text goes well with the plates.

The Vanity Fair Album. By "Jehu Junior." Vol. XII. (Vanity Fair Office).—There is no need to dwell on the rather acrid letter-press of this instalment of a well-known and popular satirical serial, the only one which maintains the traditions of stinging satire. The portraits are freer than the comments from that exaggeration which is called caricature, and which is rarely worthy of the attention of the true satirist, who is most proficient when most faithful to the life. While the writing is decidedly mannered, the cuts are varied and spontaneous to a degree which has not been observable in Vanity Fair for several years. To begin with the most striking portraits of statesmen, in his caricature of Mr. E. Clarke "Ape" has done his best; "Spy's" 'Iconoclast,' being Mr. C. Bradlaugh, is a bitter satire, but not unfair, and the artist distinctly refuses to dwell on the meaner elements of a very curious face. "T's" head of the portrait of Sir A. Paget is capital, though meretricious. Lord Randolph Churchill, by "Spy," deserves the same praise, and it is more animated. "T's" Mr. J. Russell Lowell, however, borders on caricature. The same draughtsman's 'Mr. L. H. Courtney' deserves unusual attention, although 'it is a little coarse.' "Ape's" 'Sir John T. Sinclair' is deliciously quaint, with a dash of the lemon, while his colleague "T's" 'Mr. O. S. Parnell' is terribly flat, yet derives a sting from its dogmatic air. 'M. Émile Zola,' a simple and well-studied portrait, could not be better in that respect, but it is no satire. Neither is the good and spirited likeness of Sir F. Roberts, in which only the uniform is absurd. Of the draughtsmen taken individually it may be said that "T." is too good an artist to be a caricaturist, though there is no lack of what may be called sub-satire in his mind. "Ape" does not improve—his 'Mr. Spofforth' seems his best. Practice has enabled "Spy" to draw better than before; and friction with the world has almost, but not quite, raised his taste above exaggeration.

Military Misreadings of Shakespeare. By Major Secombe. (Routledge & Sons).—There is more playfulness than humour in Major Secombe's very mild jokes. His designs are clever; they are fairly well drawn, and coloured with propriety. The disasters of horse and foot are accompanied by "but too familiar" quotations from Shakespeare. The best of the designs—there is no appreciable difference in the jokes—is that which shows the drilling of an awkward squad of men of various sizes. In this there is character.

Leaves from a Hunting Journal. By G. Bowers. (Chatto & Windus).—The volume of "hunting sketches" is by no means the worst example of a remarkably numerous class which are published in this country, but nowhere else. It is a curiously characteristic example, because it shows how very little wit, even liveliness, and how small a degree of draughtsmanship suffice for such volumes. After thorough examination we have discovered one faint shadow of a joke too weak to bear transplanting. We leave it to the buyer of the book, who will find it on p. vi. Artistically speaking, a group of hunters, on p. xviii, lighting their pipes is the best of the designs.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS. WINTER EXHIBITION.

of importance. There are very few studies, and not half-a-dozen "sketches." Deliberate criticism of such an exhibition becomes yearly more difficult, because on each occasion the critic is expected to write something new, while the art remains nearly the same, its motives are not novel, and even its materials vary but slightly, and are never radically changed. The freshest addition to the ranks of the Institute is Mr. Fulleylove, whose brilliant pictures of old gardens, palaces, and groves are strengthened by association with equally meritorious representations of Italian churches and their precincts. Other recent, if not late, elections—such as that of Mr. Walter Wilson—have enhanced the attractions of the gallery by introducing several skilled draughtsmen in well-used modes; yet the Institute, not being the artistic body which declared that it had room for no more "female" members, might have elected a few more clever ladies besides Lady Lindsay and Miss Gow.

We shall select from more than three hundred examples twelve instances of artistic value, sifted carefully from the mass. In the order of the Catalogue the first of these is Miss Gow's "Beggars my Neighbour" (No. 8), girls seated at cards by a couch. The brightness of the lighting is commendable, the colour clear, expression animated, and the modelling frank and precise.—Mr. Harry Hine's Shillington (26), a sunny street of old cottages, ending at a large church with a red-brick tower, is capital in all pictorial respects except the disproportionate figures. The clearness of the shadows and the breadth of the effect are highly artistic.—Interrupted (58) is by Mr. C. Green, and represents, in the manner known as that of M. Meissonier, a gentleman rising with an expression of impatience from his chair because an intruder appears. The painting of the brocaded silk dressing-gown proves unusual care; well-trained skill and considerable power in design are displayed in the spontaneity of the action and the spirited expression.

No. 60 is Mr. H. G. Hine's fine, broad, and poetical landscape called Dunstable Downs, which may be classed with No. 61, a representation of Moonlight at Eastbourne. Both are beautiful, and full of the pathos of mystery and the dignity of noble and simple forms that are grandly massed. The former shows the effect of a vaporous daylight on the chalky uplands, which, in the distance, are almost lost in the purplish atmosphere. The latter depicts the mist-laden twilight of the half moon pervading the dark sea-beach and lofty cliffs.

A well-known name is appended to the powerful study in deep yellow and red which Mr. J. D. Linton calls Autumn (64). The execution is rich and solid, but there is some excess of darkness in the shadows. The imitation of textures here is admirable.—Mr. Clausen's Waiting for the Ferry (71), a Dutch girl with her gleaming milk cans, standing on the bank of a canal in twilight, while reapers troop along the higher dyke, their figures sharply defined against the sky, repeats a technical motive, and approaches even the incidents of a former picture. It is welcome on account of its strength of colour, breadth of chiaroscuro, and vigorous illumination, which is of the Rembrandtish sort. The sky is weak in modelling and somewhat empty.

A Loggia, Siena (85), by Mr. Fulleylove, is a fine and solid piece of painting, made valuable by the clearness and depth of the large purple and grey shadows, the brightness of the lustre on the stone walls of the ancient city, with sculptures in white marble in the half-light, which is reflected in warm golden tints. With this let us place The Cathedral, Siena (108), by the same artist, where purple and grey tones abound on the striped architecture of the Duomo, and are interchanged with sunlight and clear reflections. These pictures are really "studies"—that is, they prove thought, care, and the exercise of taste, discrimination, and skill on the part of the artist. Cypresses, Siena, (246) is a view which applies force, simplicity, richness, breadth, and fidelity of tone, local colour, and solidity to a fine and peculiar subject. From a grass-clad space near the Campo Santo a line of deep, warm green trees raise their tops out of the cool shadows of the buildings to the still glowing levels of the air.—Durham Cathedral, from Framwell Gate, (194) is another picture of Mr. H. Hine's. It is a clean, pure, bright, and broad view of the most magnificent group of buildings in England. The water seems to be unfinished.—Mr. J. Aumonier's Bit of the Yorkshire Cliffs (218) shows with much brilliancy and spirit a brood of gulls swarming in and out of the light and shadow of a deep cleft. The effect is striking. The power and freedom of touch and colouring shown in the herbage of the foreground are admirable.

In addition we may mention the following:—Mr. J. Fahey's Whitby (5), which lacks little but the richness and peculiar intensity of the local colour of the place; Mr. J. Mogford's Valley of the Tavy (39) is a good, if somewhat conventional, not to say mannered, pastoral; Mr. J. G. Philp's Cornish Bulwark (42), the Land's End, although a little mechanical in touch, is distinguishable for true recognition of the colour of the rosy granite; Mr. H. G. Hine's Bezhill (43) is worthy of the painter, and in his poetical manner; A Study (45) is by Mr. J. D. Linton; Mr. G. H. Boughton's Autumn Ramble by the Spey (47) is marked by capital painting of distant hills and warm white clouds; a clever sketch is Mr. T. W. Wilson's The Toilet of "Blanche et Louise" (57), French sailors painting the stern of a schooner in harbour; a dashing sketch of the Wye is Mr. H. Johnson's The Wyndeliff (97); Mr. G. G. Kilburne's Unprotected Female (95), a landscape, is bright and good, but a little hard; Mr. G. Clausen's Cleaning Day, North Holland, (160) may be added to the list of his successful studies; the late Mr. J. H. D'Egville's Venue (181) recalls the agreeable qualities and the extremely mannered character of his paintings. We conclude with Noon (243), by Mr. F. J. Skill; Mr. E. H. Fahey's Sketch from Nature (261); Mr. H. G. Hine's Twilight (206); and Twilight (229), by Mr. L. P. Smythe.

ROMAN SPAIN.

3 Eastern Villas, Anglesey, Gwynedd.

ADMIRAL WOOD, who manages the Duke of Wellington's estate at Yllora, near Granada, writes:—

"There are evidences about here of several Roman villages, as, before I came, they found a leaden coffin with a skeleton inside and a massive gold ring. He must have been some chief, and buried more than eight hundred years ago.

"The other day, whilst ploughing a field adjoining this property (La Torre, Yllora), they came upon a pedestal about 3½ feet high, very neatly wrought, and as perfect as possible. It had the following inscription in letters that might have been cut yesterday, so fresh and clear are they:—

C'AMPTIVS
CANTABRINVS
REX . SHANVS
ANN. IXII
PIVS IN RVIN
NR . DEI
R.III.

This is exactly as it is cut in the stone.

"I think that the pedestal must have been for some large funeral urn or large vase, as it appears too short for a statue."

This votive stele, Dis Manibus Sacrum, must have been in memory of some Cantabrine officer from the Asturias in the north, who had left the Vindian Mountains to have his bones or ashes deposited by the banks of the Singulia

Fl., within sight of the snowy peaks of the Illipula range. "Yllora" may be identical with Ilipula laus. I cannot make out the final abbreviations; perhaps some of your readers may kindly supply the interpretation.

NOTES FROM ATHENS

THE excavations and discoveries of the last few months have been very interesting. Especially noteworthy is the circumstance that they have been made at various points outside Athens and thus is the more remarkable as in Greece it has been the custom to go on for years together excavating the Athenian soil. A remarkable change in this respect has been observable of late years. The great undertaking of German science, the excavations at Olympia, and Schliemann's discoveries at Mycenae have led to this. In the last few years the excavations made at Spata, Nauplia, Tanagra, Delos, Chersonese, Tegea, and the Piræus have attracted general attention; while at Athens itself the excavations of the Dipylon and of the Temple of Athena-Nike have not been without important results. The extension of the field of excavation was highly necessary. Of course the excavations at Athens were of great value to art and archaeology. Still it was also to be hoped that interesting discoveries made throughout Greece would throw light not only on the general history of Greece, but also on the Athenian finds. From an historical point of view, the laying bare of Olympia, Mycenae, Orcho-Menus, and Delos was a great gain, and the lovers of ancient history and art can only rejoice at the new direction of the excavations. I shall try to inform the readers of the Athenæum of some of the results of the various excavations made throughout the country.

The excavation of the Lion of Chersonese has been of late busily prosecuted. A few weeks ago the result was the discovery of 260 corpses; some forty only of the glorious dead are missing. Two of the corpses lately dug up still bear upon them the marks of having died for freedom and country. The one bears in his breast a spear, the other was pierced by two spears, which still remain in the pelvis. M. Stamatakis, who from his various excavations is well known as superintendent of such works, has used a method similar to that employed by Fiorelli on the bodies found at Pompeii in order to preserve the corpses slain at Chersonese in gypsum, and they are to be placed in the museum at Athens. They will be as nameless as the corpses preserved at Pompeii, but they will not be obscure slaves and women who could not escape the fury of the elements. The spectators will behold the noble remains of those who, if they did not save their native land, yet died gloriously for her. The museum which is adorned with their remains will, therefore, serve its true purpose of a Walhalla.

If we turn from the relics of a glorious defeat to the island devoted to the worship of Apollo, there, too, we find that the results obtained by Prof. Homolle at the expense of the French Government have been as interesting as those of three years ago. Besides the marble statues, the discovery of which has already been announced to the readers of the Athenæum, and of which the one represents a Roman, Gaius Ophellius Marcus,—according to the inscription the work of two Attic sculptors, Dionysius the son of Timarchides, and Timarchides the son of Polycles,—I have to mention that a private house has been laid bare at Delos, not unlike the dwellings at Pompeii. The walls are covered with plaster, and divided into larger and smaller divisions by parallel graffiti bands. The mosaic floors which the house formerly boasted have disappeared, and only the bed in which they lay remains. In the opinion of the young inspector of the Delian excavations, Dr. Cavvadias, if the small hill on which the house was found were cleared, there would be every chance of finding a part of the old town, with its streets, squares, and houses. He urges the Greek Archaeological Society to take up the work, since the excavations which the French Government had in view are at an end, now that it has settled important topographical questions, and found a number of statues and especially inscriptions. For the preservation of these treasures the Greek Government has determined to found a special museum on the neighbouring island of Mykonos, for Delos is at present uninhabited. A house has already been hired for the purpose, and the objects will gradually be brought over from Delos and arranged.

I have as yet refrained from telling your readers that a rich Greek settled at Alexandria, M. J. Demetriu, some months ago made a handsome present to the Greek Government. He gave it his world-renowned Egyptian collection of objects of art and coins. Of this collection, which has already arrived at Athens in several cases, I shall be able to give a more exact account when it is open to the public. It will be arranged and shown in the large rooms of the Polytechnic, where the Mycena museum has also found a place. The commission charged with the exhibition of the collection is at present occupied in examining the cabinet of coins, which is most important. According to the catalogue prepared at Paris some years ago by Feuardent, it consists of 4,163 coins, of which 534 belong to the days of the Ptolemies, 3,625 to Roman times. Since then the collection has been enriched with over a thousand additional coins. Sr. P. LAMSON.

SALES.

On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of last week a collection of engravings and etchings formed by the Rev. James J. Heywood was sold by auction by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge. A few of the higher prices realized will be found below. Nicholas Berchem, La Vache qui s'Abreuve, first state, the name etched in large letters without the address, 20s. John Dean, a portrait of Mrs. Jane Dalrymple Elliot, after Gainsborough, proof with a large margin, 42s. 10s. W. Dickinson, Benedicta Ramus, or Lady Day, after Romney, a very early proof, 25s. 6s. Albrecht Dürer, The Virgin and the Monkey, 16s. L. Gautier, Louise de Lorraine, wife of Henry III. of France, under the portrait the artist's signature, with date, 1587, 30s. 10s. Portrait of Mary Fenton, Duchess of Ancaster, in a masquerade dress, after Hudson, proof, 41s. A. van Otade, Le Peintre, ou Otade lui-même dans son Atelier, early impression, before the letters in the margin, and with the high cap, 24s. 10s. Paul Potter, Le Vacher, the large plate in the first state, and with eight cows, 1643, 31s. 10s. Rembrandt, Angels appearing to the Shepherds, third state, from the Britanno Collection, 24s. Portrait of Jan Asselyn, third state, from the Aylesford Collection, 24s. 10s. J. R. Smith, The Levee of Gower Children, after Romney, a proof of the engraving of Romney's masterpiece, 19s. James Ward, The Daughters of Sir T. Frankland, after Hoppner, proof touched by Hoppner, 25s. 10s. The collection realized 1,648s. 6s. 6d.

A collection of paintings and water colour drawings was sold on Saturday by Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods. A composition of nine figures, entitled 'A Fête Champêtre,' by Lancret, realized 850s., while another of eleven figures, named 'The Swing,' by the same artist, fetched 420s.; a portrait of a lady, by Terburg, fetched 304s.; two landscapes, with figures, by Cuyp, 241s. 10s. each; a portrait of George Gordon, Marquis of Huntly, by Vandyck, 200s.

Fine-Art Gossip.

Among Sir F. Leighton's contributions to the next exhibition of the Royal Academy will be his own portrait, intended for the Uffizi Collection, which we mentioned last year. This is a striking and vigorous picture of the P.R.A., wearing over a black coat his Doctor's gown of two deep reds, and the large gold medallion which is the emblem of the presidency. The face is nearly in full front view, the light comes from our left; the head is characteristically erect, and the expression marked by dignified candour. The modelling of the flesh, the carnations proper, and the harmony of the dress with the face and background, leave nothing to be desired. It is an even finer portrait than that of Capt. Burton which Sir F. Leighton exhibited lately. The artist has likewise a large picture of an idyllic subject, suggested by a passage in Theocritus, and comprising figures of nymphs seated and reclining. A sylvan pipe-player sits near them on an upland meadow beside a group of trees. Beyond these figures appears a vast open landscape. Portraits of the Countess of Rosebery, in white, and Mrs. Rashleigh, in black, do not exhaust the list of this painter's recent labours.

Among Mr. E. B. Jones's contributions to the Grosvenor Gallery Exhibition will be a series of superbly designed and exquisitely coloured cartoons for the stained glass in several churches. Of these the more important are as follows:—No. 1 is a Judgment window of three lights for Easthamstead Church, in which St. Michael is at the top of the centre light, holding his banner and scales, while recording angels appear below, with four angelic trumpeters. The bottom of the design is occupied by men and women rising from the grave. Two women in the light on our left represent the quick; there is a garden at the back of this group; the backgrounds of other groups are appropriate to the subjects. No. 2 is a large window designed for a church in Northumberland; the subject is Paradise, with the Lamb on a hillock (according to the mode of Van Eyck's great picture), with four rivers issuing at his feet and passing through the accessory lights of the window, near it are the four symbolic winged animals of the Evangelists; the rest of the window is filled with angels and men and women. All these paintings have lovely sentiment and delicate coloration. Grace of attitude, serenity which is beautiful in itself, complete repose and purity, pervade these fine "inventions." No. 3 consists of two wide lights executed for the cathedral at Salisbury. They comprise figures of angel pilgrims travelling with their staves in stony landscapes. These are called "angeli ministrantes"; two others are "angeli laudantes," and furnished with harps; they walk in grassy landscapes. No. 4 consists of a circular picture of Christ, showing his five wounds, and borne on winged Thrones. The latter figures are of a purple hue, according to the old tradition of painting. The robe of Christ is ultramarine. The loveliness and purity of these faces will distinguish this picture, which is in water colour. Besides the above are two designs for tapestry. The subject of No. 5 is a Dryad. She is represented as a young girl in a bluish-white robe, with a thick bush surrounding her. No. 6 depicts a Nereid playing with fishes, which she is taking out of the sea and tossing back again. The treatment of the foliage and water is adapted to tapestry. No. 7 is a panel of raised glass, gilded and enriched with colours, representing a Cupid hunt, with a blindfold Cupid stringing his bow and girls rushing away from him. In addition are a few figures for stained glass, and two small designs for metal-work, being a Nativity and a Pieta. These designs represent some of the labours of the artist during the last ten years.

Mr. GEORGE DENNIS has begun excavations at Smyrna which it is hoped may yield valuable results.

THE managers of the Essex and Chelmsford Museum are going to hold an exhibition, on January 18th and following days, of paintings by Essex artists and of Essex scenery by other than Essex artists. We hope the promoters will publish a catalogue of the exhibition, which would be a valuable contribution to English art history, and worthy of imitation by other counties.

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON will publish immediately the drawing-books which, as we have said, are to be issued under the superintendence of Mr. E. J. Poynter, R.A.

AN exhibition of historical portraits has been opened in the Künstlerhaus at Vienna. The collection numbers about nine hundred works, by German, Italian, and French painters.

It is expected that, except the decorative works, the new Hôtel de Ville, Paris, will be finished before the end of next year.

A FRENCH Monsignore has discovered a great catacomb before the S. Pancrazio gate at Rome. It has ten chapels, and extends as far as the foundations of the Villa Doria Pamphili. All the graves have been previously opened, but the discoverer hopes that he may still come upon some which have been left undisturbed. He believes the catacomb to be connected with that of St. Julius, Pope.

THE first part of 'Modern Artists,' a series of twelve illustrated biographies, which we have already described as edited by M. F. G. Dumas, will appear in January next. The biographies of Sir Frederick Leighton, P.R.A., Mr. Millais, R.A., and Mr. Herkomer, A.R.A., will make up the first part issued. The portrait of Sir Frederick, by Mr. Watts, has been etched by M. Rajon, and M. Waltner has rendered the portrait of himself painted by Mr. Millais for the Uffizi; Mr. Herkomer has written his own text and etched his own portrait, as well as two other large plates of 'The Poacher's Fate' and 'The Woodcutters,' which accompany his biography. A number of reproductions of original sketches of various descriptions are incorporated in the text, which is further enlivened by drawings of the interior of the houses inhabited by these three painters, of their studios, and of the rare works of art which have found a place in their collections.

M. ERNST MUNTZ has just corrected the last proofs of his expected work on Raphael, which is to be brought out immediately. The volume is illustrated with great profusion by the best methods of reproduction recently perfected, and in the text M. Muntz will, we hope, put an end to the confusion recently introduced into the biography of Raphael by the brilliant, but not always trustworthy, hypotheses of Prof. Hermann Grimm.

THERE died at the pretty village of Goodwick, near Fishguard Bay, on the 3rd inst., Mr. William Frederick Harrison, whose drawings and paintings, especially of coast scenery, were occasionally exhibited at the Royal Academy, the Dudley, and other galleries. He was the eldest son of the late Mrs. Harrison, the flower-painter, whom he outlived only five years.

On the 10th inst. died at Stockholm the well-known Swedish painter, Johan Kristoffer Boklund, in his sixty-third year. He was Curator of the National Museum at Stockholm and Director of the Academy of Fine Arts. He was a pupil of Couture. His best pictures were scenes from Swedish history in the sixteenth century, which he had made his particular study.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—'Maritana'; the autumn season.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch.'

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Popular Concerts.

HIGHBURY ATHENÆUM.—Dr. Gladstone's 'Bloodsman.'

By the production of Wallace's 'Maritana' for the first time in Italian, with recitatives by Signor Tito Mattei, another of the pledges set forth at the commencement of the autumn opera season at Her Majesty's was fulfilled. Judging by the state of the house at each of the two performances, this singular proceeding was successful in a managerial sense, but from an art point of view its value was less than nothing. Signor Tito Mattei's recitatives are in the conventional style, and very little can be said either for or against them, but they serve to heighten the incongruity of Wallace's feeble ballads as integral portions of a lyric drama. The performance, in which Mdlle. Widmar, Madame Trebelli, Signor Vizzani, Signor Ghilberti, and Mr. Barrington Foote took part, may be dismissed without comment. A glance at the general features of the opera season just concluded must result in conclusions the reverse of pleasing. The modest programme put forward has been carried out except as to the revival of 'Semiramide,' and of the nonfulfilment of this clause no one is likely to complain. But the mistakes made have been many and serious. The confidence and support of even our long-suffering public are likely to be forfeited by the continued representation of faded operas, by the appearance of singers without any pretensions to even mediocre ability, and by performances often disgracefully slipshod, and sometimes beneath criticism. Regarding the production of 'Maria di Gand,' Signor Tito Mattei's published letter, acknowledging the work to have been composed twelve years ago, before the influence of modern theories of opera had begun to be felt generally, sets the matter right as regards himself, but it does not explain the acceptance of the opera at the present time. It would serve no useful purpose to give a list of all the new singers who have appeared. Some failed egregiously at the outset, and others who made a favourable impression at their début did not succeed in maintaining it at subsequent performances. Madame Giovannoni-Zacchi and Signor Aldighieri are alone likely to be re-engaged on account of their artistic excellence. There was undoubtedly a considerable improvement in the chorus, but, owing to the lack of adequate rehearsals, it was on some occasions imperceptible. In the present temper of the public the establishment of a permanent lyric theatre, with performances in different languages at different periods of the year, and without any state or municipal subvention, would appear to be a practicable undertaking, but its realization is apparently as far off as ever.

The first performance in London of Mr. Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' produced in October last at the Leeds Festival, attracted to the Crystal Palace last Saturday a far larger audience than has been seen in the concert-room on any previous occasion during the present season. The work was so fully criticized in these columns on its first performance that it is needless to add much to what was then said. Further acquaintance with the music strengthens the impression that, though described on the title-page as a "sacred musical drama," the music has about it very little that is dramatic, and still less that is sacred. We are not disposed to blame the composer for this, because it is very doubtful whether the work would have gained had Mr. Sullivan, instead of allowing his ideas to flow in their natural channel, forced them in some other direction in order to satisfy conventional ideas as to what is sacred and what is dramatic. Mr. Sullivan's genius is essentially lyrical, and those portions of 'The Martyr of Antioch' in which this element predominates are precisely those in which the greatest effects are made. We may instance the whole of the opening hymn to Apollo, the tenor song, "Come, Margarita, come," and Margarita's first air, to say nothing of such numbers as the chorus "Come away with willing feet" and the "Io Psan," in proof of this statement. The choruses are in general superior to the solo music, because in the former the dramatic sinks mostly into merely a subordinate position; the only really dramatic chorus—the short "Blasphemy," p. 178 of the score—is one of the least original, suggesting both the "Barabbas!" in Bach's 'Passion according to Matthew,' and the choruses of the people in Mendelssohn's 'Christus.' 'The Martyr of Antioch' deserves, and will no doubt achieve, popularity, because, though an unequal work, it is very tuneful and melodious throughout, the workmanship is excellent, and further (a point of no slight importance), it is most gratefully written for soloists, chorus, and orchestra.

The performance on Saturday was in some respects most admirable. The cast of soloists included Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Henry Cross. As all these, excepting the first named, sang the work at Leeds, it is only needful now to say that they repeated at the Crystal Palace the successes they had obtained in Yorkshire. Mrs. Osgood, who replaced Madame Albani in the part of Margarita, sang the whole of her music delightfully. We have no more thorough or more conscientious artist now before the public than the American soprano, and we think that this season she is singing better than ever. The orchestra was admirable, with the one reservation that the brass was sometimes too obtrusive; but the Crystal Palace Choir, to whom the important choral work was allotted, proved itself—we fear we must say as usual—altogether unequal to the requirements of the music. It was not so much that they sang inaccurately, though in the unaccompanied hymn, "Brother, thou art gone before us," the false intonation was in places absolutely distressing; but the great fault was a total want of spirit, a feebleness, we might almost say "flabbiness," about the choruses, which to those who had not heard the music at Leeds must have conveyed a most inadequate idea of the power and beauty of some of the numbers. It would be far better for the reputation of the Crystal Palace Concerts that choral music should be excluded altogether from their plan of operations than that it should be rendered in such an unsatisfactory manner. The choir do well enough in familiar music, such as the 'Hymn of Praise'; but the listening to novelties performed by them has been for the most part a painful experience. Mr. Sullivan, who conducted his own work, was warmly and deservedly applauded at the close.

At the Popular Concerts of Saturday and Monday last Mdlle. Janotha made her final appearances for the present season. She played on Saturday Beethoven's 'Waldstein' Sonata, and on Monday Chopin's Ballade in a minor. The objectionable practice has grown up at these concerts of encoring the pianist, whatever may be the length or character of the work performed. The blame for this must be equally distributed between the artists and the audience. It is, perhaps, vain to expect the latter to exercise moderation in the matter, but a little firmness on the part of the former might serve to counteract what is fast becoming an absurdity. A notable feature of Monday's concert was the performance of Brahms's Sonata in G, Op. 78, for piano and violin, by Madame Norman-Néruda and Mdlle. Janotha. Notwithstanding the dreamy, meditative nature of this work, it has become an established favourite, and its beauties are more apparent at each successive hearing. The admirable singing of Mr. Arthur Oswald also deserves mention. This young baritone has the making of a first-rate artist.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Dr. Bridge, is distinguishing itself by the production of novelties from English pens. Last season the late Henry Smart's 'Jacob' was given by this society for the first time in London, and Dr. Bridge's cantata 'Boadicea' was also produced. At the first concert of the present season, which was given at the Highbury Athenæum last Monday, another new work, the sacred cantata 'Nicodeamus,' composed by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, was performed for the first time. Dr. Gladstone is the organist of Norwich Cathedral, and has hitherto been chiefly known as a composer by various collections of pieces written for his instrument, which evince the possession of a considerable amount of pleasing melody, and of thorough technical training. The present is, so far as we are aware, his first important vocal composition. The cantata is divided into three short parts, and occupies about fifty minutes in performance. The words are mostly selected from the Scriptures, but verses of more or less familiar hymns are interspersed. In its general style the music shows traces of the influence of Mendelssohn, but without anything that can be called a plagiarism, or even a reminiscence. The choruses are excellently written and very pleasing, and Dr. Gladstone may be complimented on being able to compose fugues which are clever without being dry. The solos are very melodious, and well written for the voice. The duet "Jesu, Lord, may such devotion," deserves the epithet charming. The instrumental preludes to the first and third parts of the work are very good, especially the latter. In these numbers Dr. Gladstone shows a good feeling for tone-colour, but we think he might with advantage reconsider the instrumentation of some of the solo numbers (especially Nos. 4, 6, and 16), in which too exclusive use of the strings gives a certain monotony to the accompaniment. It is only fair to the composer to say that a cathedral organist can have in general but little opportunity of acquiring that practical acquaintance with the orchestra without which it is almost impossible to become a master in the art of scoring, and the present work contains sufficient indications of natural ability in this direction to warrant the prediction that with further practice Dr. Gladstone may far surpass this his presumably first attempt on a large scale. The solos in the cantata were sung by Miss Thornthwaite and Mr. Alfred Kenningham. Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' and a miscellaneous selection completed the programme of the concert.

Musical Gossip.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ will shortly introduce Berlioz's sacred trilogy 'L'Enfance du Christ' at his Manchester concerts, and the work will subsequently be performed in London. The vocal score with English words is already published by Messrs. Forsyth Brothers. The next performance of 'Faust' at St. James's Hall is fixed for Saturday, January 8th.

ON the occasion of the opening of the Melbourne International Exhibition, in October last, a prize was offered for the composition of the best cantata, to be performed at the inaugural ceremony. We have had an opportunity of examining the prize work—the cantata 'Victoria,' by Léon Caron—and are sorry to have to express an unfavourable opinion on it. It is impossible honestly to describe it as anything but trash; and the conclusion is forced upon us that either the standard of musical ability at Melbourne must be very low, or that the judges, who, we are given to understand, were mostly amateurs, were altogether unqualified for their work.

MR. E. DANKSBUTHER announces another series of Musical Evenings, to be given at his residence, 12, Orme Square, on January 20th, February 3rd and 17th, and March 3rd. The programmes, as usual, are most interesting. On the first evening Scambiati's Quintet in a flat, Chopin's Sonata, Op. 65, for piano and violoncello, and Beethoven's great Sonata, Op. 106, are to be given; while for the remaining concerts, in addition to more or less familiar works by Beethoven and Bach, Brahms's Piano Quartet in A, Mr. Hubert Parry's Quartet in a flat, Dvorák's Trio in c minor, and a Sonata and Quartet by Edvard Grieg are promised.

MILIE JANOTHA gave her second and last pianoforte recital this season on Wednesday afternoon at St. James's Hall. Her programme included Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 27, No. 1, Bach's Fantasia in c minor, three of Chopin's Preludes, Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses, and Schumann's 'Carnaval.'

THE North London Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, gave their first concert for the season on Thursday evening last, at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street, when Mr. J. F. Barnett's cantata, 'The Building of the Ship,' and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme.

AT the third of Mr. Stephen S. Stratton's Chamber Concerts at Birmingham, last Tuesday week, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, Spohr's Duo, Op. 13, for violin and viola, Alfred Mellon's String Quartet in F, and Goetz's Trio in c minor, were the principal works performed.

WE have received from Messrs. Rudall, Carter & Co. the 'Professional Pocket-book' for 1881. This publication is now so well known for its convenient arrangement and its general utility to the musical profession, that it needs no recommendation from us. It will suffice to say that the issue for the coming year shows no falling off in value.

HERR WILHELM TREIBER, the conductor of the Euterpe Concerts at Leipzig, has been appointed conductor to the theatre at Cassel, and enters upon his duties at the new year.

A NEW pianist, Fraulein Eugenie Menter, a younger sister of the distinguished pianist Sophie Menter, has recently appeared with success in a concert at Munich.

AT the National Theatre in Pesth a new opera by Franz Liszt, 'A Névtelen Husak,' was produced last night. The music is said to be original and well adapted.

HEAR Pydon's Conservatorium at Dresden will celebrate, on the 26th of January, the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation by a performance of Bach's great Mass in a minor, in which the chorus and orchestra will consist of present, and the soloists of former, pupils of the institution.

THE Musikalisches Wochenblatt makes, on the authority of the musical correspondence of a Riga paper, the hardly credible statement that at a performance of 'Lohengrin' in St. Petersburg an air from Verdi's 'Luise Miller' was interpolated in Wagner's opera.

A NEW "secular oratorio," entitled 'Alario,' by Georg Vierling, was produced with great success at Bremen last month, under the direction of Herr Reinthaler.

RUBINSTEIN's 'Nero' was given at the Berlin Opera on the 3rd inst. and met with a somewhat cool reception.

THE WEEK.

Cover.—'Adrienne Lecouvreur,' a Drama in Five Acts from the French of Scribe and Legouvé.

IT can scarcely be said that in 'Adrienne Lecouvreur' Madame Modjeska exhibits any new phase of her powers. In it, however, she shows for the first time the full value of her method. That special grace and charm of womanhood which she is able to convey is not less apparent and not less effective in 'Adrienne Lecouvreur' than in 'Marie Stuart.' Its effect is even more powerful, as it is balanced by no display of queenly dignity or state. With it, moreover, is coupled in the last act of the play an amount of interest such as, in degree at least, has not before been exhibited.

Very heavily handicapped is an actress who attempts to play Adrienne Lecouvreur in English. To our public the recitation of the fable of La Fontaine, which constitutes the chief feature in the second act, is meaningless, and that even of the famous denunciation from 'Phèdre' is not much more significant. Of the public frequenting the theatre not a third knows, probably, of the existence of 'Phèdre,' and of that third, even, a singularly small per-centage is aware of the meaning of the recitation afforded. The same difficulty attended the one actress who before Madame Modjeska essayed this rôle in English. In October, 1849—the year in which the drama of MM. Scribe and Legouvé was given at the Comédie Française—Mrs. Stirling played the heroine of an adaptation by John Oxenford, entitled 'The Reigning Favourite.' In this, as in the present adaptation, the scenes on which Rachel, and after her Madame Ristori and Mdlle. Sarah Bernhardt, relied for their strongest effects fell comparatively flat, and the hold on the public had either to be obtained in the comedy of the earlier acts or in the great concluding situation.

In the opening scenes the singularly artificial nature of the play was strongly felt. This fact may be taken as proving that the impression made by the actress was scarcely profound. If this conclusion be accepted, an ample revenge was subsequently taken.

Recalling many successive interpretations of Adrienne by artists of highest mark, we do not hesitate, so far as the last scene is concerned, to award Madame Modjeska the precedence. Less passionate and less subtle than some of her predecessors, the latest interpreter was neither less powerful nor less successful. To argue, as is sometimes attempted, concerning the character of Adrienne Lecouvreur is mere futility. All that we know of the heroine is that she was an actress and that she loved. To one with imagination these facts are everything; to those devoid of that not too commonly accorded gift they are nothing. Each succeeding exponent is free to treat the character as she pleases. In place, then, of wild burst and mad impulse, Madame Modjeska shows a beautiful, tender, and trusting being, to whom love is the breath of her nostrils and sacrifice the rule of her life. By the thought of rivalry she can be raised to something approaching fury; but love holds her in too fervent clasp to permit of her wasting much time upon hate. This is as good a conception as another, and it is presented with admirable art. Not until the death scene is reached is the influence upon the audience quite electrical. At that point, however, the effect is irresistible. Not more remarkable is the triumph itself than are the moderation and legitimacy of the means by which it is reached. A conception equally thoughtful, intelligent, and beautiful has not often been realized with success so complete. With those demonstrations of physical horror which are the resource of actresses incapable of higher and more intellectual effort Madame Modjeska entirely dispenses. In no previous performance of Adrienne Lecouvreur which we recall has the death scene been so picturesque, so beautiful, so artistic, and so touching. The detail throughout is carefully studied, and the varying and contrasted phases of suffering are admirably shown.

For the highest gifts of tragedy 'Adrienne Lecouvreur' affords no scope. It is, as it was intended to be, a drama of real life, or life which is quasi-real, and of times which are almost modern. In the rendering of the scenes of delirium, an exaltation the effect of which comes little short of terror is displayed. Pity is, of course, present throughout. Very far the finest performance Madame Modjeska has yet exhibited is this. It needs only a little more repose at the outset of the fifth act to rank as a perfect exposition of a poetical conception.

Moderate support is afforded. The want of distinction, which is the chief fault in the subordinate characters, is the more marked by the contrast afforded by Madame Modjeska, who in this respect is admirable. Mr. Anson acts with much power as Michonnet, the prompter, but is too virile, especially in his wooing. Mr. Lin Rayne presented in the right style the Abbé Choiseul, and Mr. Robertson gave a conscientious rendering of Maurice de Saxe. A little more attention to the recitation of Adrienne Lecouvreur in the fourth act is requisite. That the Prince de Bouillon should seek to distract his attention is conceivable; that he should yield her attention almost undivided while the woman he loves is reciting in her most powerful style is not probable. Mrs.

Amy Roselle as the Princesse had a rôle but indifferently suited to her capacities. Miss Emery was natural as the Duchesse d'Aumont.

Dramatic Gossip.

Miss Litton's appearance at the Gaiety Matinees will take place about the 15th of January in Wycherley's comedy, 'The Country Girl.' Performances will be given every day. Goldsmith's 'Good-natured Man' and 'The Busybody' of Mrs. Centlivre are also promised. Each piece will be played for a fortnight. The company Miss Litton has engaged includes Mr. Hermann Vezin, Mr. W. Farren, Mr. Lionel Brough, Mr. Stephens, Misses Cresswell and Harris, and many other actors.

A new piece by Mr. Frank Marshall, with music by Signor Orsini, will be played early in the new year at the Olympic Theatre.

A ONE-ACT comedietta by Mr. W. Ellis, entitled 'Our Relatives,' has been produced at the Olympic. It is familiar in story and conventional in treatment.

Mrs GENEVIEVE WARD quitted England for America in the Bothnia on Saturday last. A sea-voyage has been recommended her for her health. After her return, early in the new year, she will appear in a comedy, the name and nature of which are for the present withheld.

'DRYFOGGS,' a three-act comedy of MM. Victorien Sardou and Émile de Najac, produced at the Palais Royal, has obtained a complete success, for which the acting of Madame Chamonot and M. Daubray in the principal rôles is largely responsible.

The Comédie Française has revived, with a strong cast, 'Jean Baudry,' the dramatic chef-d'œuvre of M. A. Vauquerie.

A SPLENDID AND MOST APPROPRIATE CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

A LIBRARY OF RELIGIOUS POETRY.

WITH BIOGRAPHICAL AND LITERARY NOTES.

EDITED BY

PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D. LL.D., AND ARTHUR GILMAN, M.A.

It has been the aim of the Editors to make the present Collection truly Catholic. It embraces a body of Representative Poems of all Ages, Descriptions, and Countries.

While there are specimens of the Poetry of almost all the Masters of English Composition, the Minor Poets have not been forgotten.

Amongst living Authors who have cheerfully sanctioned the use of their Poems may be mentioned Matthew Arnold, E. M. Blackwell, H. Browne, Robert Browning, Mrs. D. M. Craik, Charlotte Elliott, O. Wendell Holmes, Lord Houghton, Jean Ingelow, John H. Newman, Archbishop Trench, Alfred Tennyson, J. O. Whit-tier, H. W. Longfellow, &c. and of the recently dead, whose Copyrights still exist in the hands of Publishers or Relatives, may be named Catherine Winkworth, A. A. Proctor, J. M. Neale, M. F. Lyte, John Keble, Charles Kingsley, Frances Havergal, Elizabeth B. Browning, &c.

"This handsome volume will find a very extensive circle of purchasers who will give it a hearty reception. We have nothing like it. The volume contains almost every good poem that could be named. The compilers have had a heart in their work and have placed the religious world under a deep obligation to them."

GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

JAMES EPPS & Co. HOMOEOPATHIC CHEMISTS, LONDON,

MAKERS OF ROSEBUD BRAND HOT BEVERAGE FOR AFTERNOON TEA.

POETICAL LICENSE.

From the British Medical Journal of Dec. 4, 1880.

"In another column we quote a poem of Mr. Tennyson's issued in his new volume entitled 'Ballads and other Poems,' published this week. This poem is likely to attract great attention, because it deeply wounds the professions which poets and orators alike have commonly agreed to decorate with the palm due to self-deceiving virtues, pitying kindness, self-devotion, and untiring craft. Unless distinguished by these virtues the medical profession is false to its mission and belies its history. That all its members should alike be patters of these virtues is hardly to be expected, and cannot be predicated. It cannot be too deeply deplored that the laureate poet of our present time should devote his genius to emblem, though in language of singular beauty and touching pathos, a figure which we venture to say is unknown as a type in any of our hospitals, and that he has preferred to epitomise in his verse a current and great slander, rather than to glorify the living type which may be found in every hospital in Great Britain, and which belies the standard which Tennyson's verse seems to aim at establishing. It would be an evil day for humanity if that slander which his lines embody were true, and if there were, indeed, to be found in any Children's Hospital, in any civilised country, a surgeon 'with coarse red hair, big face, big chest, big merciless hand, happier in mauling the limbs than in trying to save the limb.' Not only does he hold up this type as that of the surgeon in the Children's Hospital, but he endorses it by adding:—

"That I can well believe; for he looked so coarse and so red,
I could think he was one of them who would break their joints on the dead.
And though the living day that had loved him, and shamed at his name,
Drum'd with the bellish corse—that ever such things should be."

A verse more ungenerously contrived to insult a profession, and to hold up to execration a class who, more than any other, have devoted their lives to the service of humanity and their labours to its science, was never written. Medical men will feel bitterly the insult which is offered and the injustice which has been done; but, fortunately, their work and their character speak for itself, as it has spoken through centuries; and not even the angry words of one of the most accomplished of modern poets will do more than raise a passing feeling of pain and bitter regret that the character and motive of medical work should be so shockingly misrepresented."

The foregoing extract from the British Medical Journal, of the 4th of December, 1880, accuses the Poet Laureate of "slandering" the whole medical profession. A more unjust accusation, a more stupid calumny, could hardly be invented. The Journal mentioned utterly ignores the admissions made by certain physiologists before the Royal Commission on the practice of subjecting live animals to experiments for scientific purposes, while its assertion that Mr. Tennyson "holds up this type as that of the surgeon in the Children's Hospital," is, we believe, not merely untrue, but totally opposite to the truth. And it is totally contrary to fact that Mr. Tennyson has "contrived to insult a profession and to hold up to execration a class," &c.

The Laureate describes the medical officer of the Children's Hospital as "our kindly old doctor," and contrasts him, with all the poet's truth and power, against the surgeons from the "schools of France and of other lands"—scolding at prayer, sneering at Christ, falsifying, heartless, pitiless, cruel. The portrait in several points is not unlike Magendie, than whom a more wantonly cruel miscreant seldom, if ever, disgraced the human form. Magendie was rough in voice, of coarsest manners, and things and discussed subjects before ladies not fit for women to hear, took pleasure in inflicting pain, and even teased and mocked at agony. We think the Laureate's description of the vivisectionist's capacity is too favourable. Magendie's knowledge and reasoning powers were small. Sir Charles Bell, F.R.S., asserted that "those who are guilty of protracted cruelties do not possess minds capable of appreciating the laws of Nature." In the same number of the British Medical Journal is an article on "THE INFLUENCE OF MUSIC ON THE CIRCULATION." Dogs, cats, and rabbits were "experimented" upon. The animals, after being poisoned with curare and strychnin, had "melodies" played to them on violins, clarionets, and flutes, while their blood pressure was measured by a mercurial manometer placed in connexion with the carotid artery. "The effect varied with the breed of dog employed." We are heavily informed that "these results are just what might have been expected from a consideration of our knowledge of the effects of stimulation of other sensory nerves. These facts confirm the truth of the views of Aristotle, Plato, and Pythagoras as to the necessity of the cultivation of music by children." ("Now, if all this is not what may be justly termed, in Professor St. George Mirvart's phraseology, 'Poet's folly'—a mania for mad and blood—a shame to our science, and a deep disgrace to humanity—what is it?")

Playing tunes to poisoned dogs and noting down their heart beats! which varied with the different breeds! confirms the necessity of the cultivation of music by children!!! And this cool blooded and stupid devilry is termed "science," and occupies the pages of the British Medical Journal. Not even the imagination of the great Michael Angelo is in the "Last Judgment" ever coarsened, we believe, the idea of devils playing melodies to the tortured damned and noting down their heart beats. It even out-begs Dante's "Inferno."

The public will be interested to know that the majority of the members of the British Medical Association think of such matter as this, and how far those members consider it is of a nature to improve the practice of medicine and surgery and advance the humanity and honour of their noble order.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
10, OXFORD-STREET, LONDON, W.C.

AUTOTYPE represents Permanent Photographic Printing by several distinct Processes—

FIRST.—PIGMENT PRINTING, under Glass and Johnson's Patents.—The Photographic Image is built up of Carbon, Charcoal, and other permanent pigments. These materials permit a wide range of Monochrome expression. Pictures copied up to a size of 3 feet. Autotype Art is known throughout Europe, its productions are absolutely Permanent.

SECOND.—COLLOTYPE, or PHOTOGRAPHY in the PRINTING PROCESS.—A Process perfected by the Company and adapted for BOOK ILLUSTRATIONS.

This Process is employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, Paleographical, Numismatical, Archaeological and other Learned Societies, and by the leading Publishers in London and Paris. It affords the following advantages:—The Picture drawn on the paper with suitable materials ready for binding, the Fac-simile character of the result, the cheapness for Editions of 500, 600, &c.

THIRD.—WOODTYPE, or RELIEF PRINTING, in which a Metal Matrix yields a large number of Prints.—This Process is cheap, well adapted for Portraits, Engravings and Miscellaneous designs, and subjects of continuous graduation. Where pure High Lights or Vigorous effects are required the Process is unsuitable. Woodtypes require mounting. Woodtype type forms an additional and the more important Colotype Process, and enables the Company to execute Orders by the method best suited to the particular Work.

For terms and Specimens apply to the Managers.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE-ART GALLERY
displays a noble COLLECTION of COPIES of the OLD MASTERS, and many fine Examples of Modern Art.
JUST PUBLISHED, India, Two Shells, 6s. and 12s. "COME UNTO THESE YELLOW WATERS" after the painting by Walter Field Esq. Exhibited at the Royal Academy, 1874, and at the Paris Universal Exhibition 1875. This fine Autotype combines the merits of an Engraving with the beauty of the ARTIST'S touch. His fine Field having transported his subject into Monochrome especially for Autotype.
With the ready in January AT TOTAL REPRODUCTION OF TWELVE DRAWINGS and PAINTINGS by P. O. HANCOCK Esq.

THE "ELSTOW" BUNYAN.

A NEW EDITION OF THE 'PILGRIM'S PROGRESS,'

With Memoir, Bibliography, Index, and numerous Original Illustrations.

* * * The wood sides of this book are made of the Old Oak taken from Elstow Church previous to restoration.

From the CHRISTMAS BOOKSELLER

THE "ELSTOW" BUNYAN (John Walker & Co.).—"The new edition of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim' has several features of a character so remarkable as to be certain to attract general attention. A correct text has been secured by the careful collection of all the editions issued up to Bunyan's death, which amounted to eleven. Bunyan was a man of second thoughts; and, in consequence, the third edition of his 'Pilgrim' was in point of fact the first complete issue of his immortal dream. A memoir of the author has been specially prepared for this present edition, including the results of the latest criticisms and investigations; to which is appended an account of all the editions before mentioned, with a narrative of the successive changes and additions, either of text or engravings, which marked successive issues of the work among us. Bunyan lived to superintend them. Upwards of thirty original illustrations appear in the volume, designed and executed expressly for it—groups of the principal figures in the allegory happily reproducing the characteristics assigned them in it; and views of local interest around Elstow and Bedford. Among these is an effective panoramic representation of the village and its neighbourhood, as seen from the top of Elstow Church tower. These features, unique in themselves, are not all that recommend the 'Elstow' Bunyan to public notice. It can boast of material relics of the great English genius never before accessible to his numerous admirers. In the course of centuries the wooden beams and pews of Elstow Church had grown old and decayed, to such a point as lately to make a thorough restoration necessary. The publishers of the 'Elstow' edition have secured as much of the old wood as had to be replaced by new construction; and portions of this have been applied to the binding of the new edition, in panels countersunk on either side. The oak boards are unpolished, and set off by the contrast of French crimson or blue (at the purchaser's option); the effect is as rare as it is artistic. . . . We have said enough to indicate the merits of this truly memorial edition of John Bunyan. It claims a welcome from a much larger public than any one modern school of opinion. There is no man, and, above all, no Englishman, who can appreciate literary genius united to sterling worth, but must hold in deserved respect and even affection the honest and gifted author of the 'Pilgrim's Progress.' Every such person ought to find a place on his table for the 'Elstow' edition."

THE NEW NOVELS.

JEANNETTE. By Mary C. Rowsell, Author of 'Love Loyal,' &c. 3 vols.

"Jeannette" is a love story replete with deep interest and admirably told, which regains the attraction of the last page. The plot is true to nature, the characters are drawn with a master hand, the descriptions are clearly delineated, and the language is forcible. —Court Journal

GERALDINE AND HER SUITORS. By Mrs. SIMPSON, Author of 'Winnie's History,' &c. 3 vols.

"This book is both pleasing to read and pleasing to remember." —Illustrated London News

"Mrs. Simpson's novel displays considerable literary merit. The descriptions of scenery, men, and manners are lifelike. The interest is well sustained from first to last." —Court Journal

LITTLE PANSY. By Mrs. Randolph. Author of 'Gentianella,' &c. 3 vols.

"This novel is sure to be popular. It is a most amusing story. Little Pansy is a charming creature." —Sunday Times

"Little Pansy" is a most telling story. Not only is the heroine a sweet and lovable girl, but the remaining characters are drawn with artistic skill. —Whitell Review

DIMPLETHORPE. By the Author of 'ST CLAY'S,' &c. 3 vols.

"Dimplethorpe" is a well written, farcical, agreeable and interesting story. The characters are naturally drawn. —St. James's Gazette

"The study of character which the author proposed to herself is exhibited with considerable skill. She describes the better sort of village people with pleasant humour." —Illustrated London News

"For quiet humour, careful observation, and cultivated style, 'Dimplethorpe' is equal to any of the author's previous works." —John Bull

STRICTLY TIED UP. 3 vols. "Strictly Tied Up" is an entertaining. It is in every sense a novel conceived in a light and happy vein. —Athenæum

"Strictly Tied Up" is a very cleverly constructed novel, as amusing as it is ingenious. —St. James's Gazette

BELGIUM.

French literature in Belgium this year has to deplore a great loss in the decease of MM. Paul Devaux, Aug. Orts, and Eug. van Bommel. The first and the second were men of Liberal politics, whose services to the State were most valuable; Van Bommel was a distinguished professor. All three leave a name in literature. Paul Devaux had just completed his remarkable 'Études Politiques sur l'Histoire Romaine,' when death called him away before the publication of the book. Eug. van Bommel had this year published an interesting 'Traité de la Littérature Française,' and a curious 'Histoire de Belgique,' textually borrowed from the contemporaneous writers of every age, from that of Julius Cæsar down to our own. He conducted also 'La Belgique Illustrée,' an excellent publication, adorned with numerous engravings, and composed of monographs on our principal towns and districts. The first volume is already completed, and the second is in course of preparation for publication. Foreigners who would make themselves acquainted with our local history and monuments will not be able to find a work more attractive.

Poets and novelists have not let the pen rest idle this year. Among the former we may name the new collections of MM. J. Demoutin, Bailly, Verdavaine, de Bailliet, Gillion, and Nizet; among the latter the stories of MM. Cam. Lemonnier and Eln. Leclercq, also the 'Œuvres' of Comte Maurice Duchastel, which comprise poems and dramatic pieces. Our best living poet, M. Ch. Potin, has published, under the title 'Essais de Littérature Dramatique en Belgique,' his historical dramas and his scènes de mœurs. We may mention also 'Le Théâtre' of M. J. Labarre and 'La Bernoise,' the libretto of a comic opera by M. Lucien Solvay; the piece has been played with success at the Royal Theatre of Brussels.

M. Aug. Scheler, the librarian of the King and of the Comte de Flandre, has edited the second and last volume of the 'Dictionnaire Étymologique de la Langue Wallonne,' by his late friend, Ch. Grandgagnage. This is a work that will be very interesting to all students of the Romance dialects, all the more because the patois of Liège, Namur, Mons, and Tournai have hitherto been too much neglected by philologists. The posthumous verses (French and Walloon) of the late A. Picard have been issued with a biographical notice by M. Alphonse Le Roy. M. J. Vanden Gheyn has produced an interesting notice on the primitive name of the Aryans. The 'Dénouement de l'Histoire de Rome' is a drama translated by M. E. Nève from the Sanscrit of the poet Bhavabhūti. M. C. de Harlez has enriched Oriental literature by his 'Manuel du Pehlvi,' the old Persian language of sacred and historical literature. The late M. Uricoechea, whom this year science has lost, had completed his improved edition of the well-known Arabic grammar of O. P. Caspari. Of the 'Histories' of Tacitus a new and critical edition has been published by M. Nantreuil. The mémoires of M. Ad. de Ceuleneer, entitled 'Septime Sévère, sa Vie et son Règne,' a work crowned by the Royal Academy, is conscientious and new. All these works confer honour on Belgian erudition.

In philosophy we have to notice the series of 'Essais de Psychologie,' by M. Ch. Loomans, whose method is analytical; also the original studies of M. J. Delbecq, entitled 'Le Sommeil et les Rêves.' The 'Éléments d'Esthétique Générale,' by M. Guillaume de Coster, will be very useful to artists and critics of art. M. Edm. Vanderstraeten has given us the fifth volume of his curious monographs entitled 'La Musique aux Pays-Bas avant le XIX^e Siècle.' M. Em. Leclercq in 'L'Art et les Artistes' gives, in connexion with studies of various æsthetic questions, studies of the artists Rubens, Jordans, Snyders, Van Dyck, Wiertz, and De Groux. M. Frédéric Faber has completed his 'Histoire du Théâtre Français en Belgique,' a book bearing evidence of numerous and minute researches.

Bibliography has been exceptionally cultivated this year. First to be noticed here are the works of MM. Ferd. Vanderhaeghen and Alph. Willoms. The latter has given in 'Les Elzevier'—a book that has made a sensation among the specialists of all countries—a history of the celebrated printers and their productions. M. Ferd. Vanderhaeghen, librarian of the Ghent University and a scholar well known in England, continues the publication of his 'Bibliotheca Belgica,' in which he enumerates, describes, and estimates all the printed books of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that were published in the Netherlands or bear any relation to their history. The work is a mine of unheard-of wealth for all men of science and research in Belgium and Holland. M. Alph. Goovaerts has published two important works: the first, a mémoire crowned by the Royal Academy, contains the history and bibliography of musical typography in the Netherlands from the earliest times; the second is a bibliographical study, really new, on 'Abraham Verhoeven d'Anvers,' who is here described as the earliest European journalist or "gazettier." The monograph is illustrated with fifteen prototypes, reproducing several numbers of the Antwerp Gazette as issued by Verhoeven at the commencement of the seventeenth century. A Flemish translation has been made, and one in English is in course of preparation.

Many books of voyages and travels have appeared this year. Under the title 'Niger et Bénoué,' M. Ad. Burdo has given us an account of his travels in Central Africa in 1878. His book is illustrated with maps and engravings. Another explorer attached to the Belgian expeditions, Dr. Dutrieux, has studied the African question from a commercial point of view, and after indicating its difficulties and the means of surmounting them, he proposes the creation of a European commercial confederation. Following the example of Comte Goblet d'Alviella, M. Jules Leclercq has given us an account of his travels in his book 'Le Tyrol et le Pays des Dolomites.' Excursions in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Turkey, Greece, and Asia Minor have supplied to M. Alfred Brunel materials for two interesting volumes. M. J. Chalon has published an account of his excursions in Egypt and Tunis. The curious 'Souvenirs' of Lieut.-Gen. Baron Lahure relate mostly to his sojourn in Dutch Malaisia before the year 1830. M. Émile de Laveleye has collected in one volume his 'Lettres d'Italie,' which appeared first in the Revue de Belgique.

In the department of jurisprudence there is to be noticed the first volume of a great work, 'Le Droit Civil International,' produced this year by the fertile pen of Prof. F. Laurent, a writer already so well known by his 'Études sur l'Histoire de l'Humanité,' and by his 'Principes de Droit Civil.' We may name here the 'Manuel Populaire des Sociétés de Secours Mutuels,' by M. E. Bedinghaus.

Books relating to our own national history are, as usual, most numerous. The Archiviste-Général du Royaume, M. Gachard—one of our most illustrious veterans in historical studies—has published an important 'Histoire de Belgique au Commencement du XVIII^e Siècle.' M. Léon Vanderkindere, author of 'Le Siècle des Artevelde,' has given us the results of an anthropological inquiry made respecting the complexions of children in Belgian schools. Those whose idiom is Flemish have mostly light-coloured hair and blue eyes; while those whose idiom is Walloon have brown hair and dark eyes. The same writer, in a rectorial address lately issued, 'Du Rôle de la Tradition dans l'Histoire de Belgique,' gives us in a sort of sketch a philosophy of our national history. M. Arthur Dussanget has published an erudite and attractive book, 'L'Inquisition en Belgique avant et pendant le XVI^e Siècle.' M. Alph. Wauters has devoted an interesting volume to describing the efforts made, at the close of the seventeenth century, to draw Belgium into union with the protectionist system of that time. An Ultramontane tone prevails in the work of M. Francotte, where he gives the history of the propaganda of the French Encyclopedists in the district of Liège during the last century. Last year M. Kunziger gave us an aspect of the same facts, but written in a liberal spirit. M. Pergameni has drawn a curious picture of the ten years of national history extending from the revolution of 1789 to the coup d'état of Napoleon I. For the whole period extending from the sixteenth century to the year 1831 Col. Wauwermans has recounted many episodes in military history, all à propos of the two citadels the Northern and the Southern at Antwerp. M. Frère-Orban, the Prime Minister of Belgium and Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has just issued, under the title of 'La Belgique et la Vatican,' a complete collection of documents and parliamentary pieces bearing on the rupture with the Holy See. These official pieces are preceded by a very curious introduction, which sketches the history of the relations between Belgium and the Papacy from 1830 down to the rupture. Numerous documents concerning our national history have been published by MM. Stanislas Bormans, Piot, Gilliodts van Severen, Edw. van Evon, Kervyn de Lettenhove, Goffinet, and others. Among these useful editions one demands especial notice: the continuation of the 'Correspondance du Cardinal Granvelle,' edited by M. Edm. Pouillet. This correspondence will have a vivid interest for all those who make a study of the sixteenth century, and of the Netherlands during that epoch.

Another object of predilection among learned Belgians is local history. Among the most erudite and fertile of our writers in this department, M. Alph. Vandenpeereboom, a Minister of State, may be first mentioned. Having previously devoted some important works to Ypres, his native town, he has this year in the third volume of his 'Ypriana,' given us studies of its original municipal institutions. M. Théodore Bernier has published a dictionary—geographical, historical, archaeological, biographical, and bibliographical—of all the towns and communes of Hainault, also a history of the town of Beaumont. M. Barbier has written 'L'Histoire de l'Abbaye de Floreffe,' and M. Alph. Jacobs 'L'Histoire de l'Abbaye de Ste. Gertrude à Louvain.' M. Matthieu has commenced 'L'Histoire du Conseil de Flandre,' which was created at the close of the fourteenth century by the first Duc de Bourgogne, and subsisted until the French conquest at the close of the last century. M. V. Brants has published an important historical essay on the condition of the rural classes down to the close of the eighteenth century. To this department—one but little explored—belongs also the small book of M. Hermann Pergameni, 'Les Guerres des Paysans,' of which the range extends from the time of the Roman Empire down to the jacquerie of Galicia in 1846 and to the revolts in Ireland.

The fétes of our cinquantième, celebrated this year with such éclat in Belgium, have made our contemporaneous period of history—the time 1830–80—a chosen theme for many authors. Among them the indefatigable M. Théodore Juste has been prominent, as indeed was to be expected, for of this period in our annals he has made for himself a sort of speciality. And this year he has given us, in close succession, a new edition of his 'Histoire du Congrès National' (with a preface by Émile de Laveleye); next a new edition of 'L'Histoire des Régnes de Léopold I. et de Léopold II.'; also a new edition of the 'Lettres sur la Belgique Indépendante,' and a biography of one of the most illustrious founders of this realm, the statesman Charles Rogier—one of the few survivors of the leading politicians of 1830. M. Louis Hymans has published a curious essay, 'La Belgique Contemporaine,' and has completed his great work, 'L'Histoire Parlementaire,' which contains a faithful and complete résumé of all legislative proceedings in the two Belgian Chambers for the years 1831–80. M. Frédéric Croquet has produced a good commentary on our Belgian Constitution, which, however, does not make us forget the excellent work on the same topic already published in Flemish by M. G. Rolin-Jacquemyns. Several of the leading men in the Belgian revolution have published memoirs and recollections; among others, General Comte Vander Meere, who died soon after the publication of his book. MM. Namèche and Vercamer have each produced an extensive history of Belgium from the earliest times down to the present. M. Namèche, Rector of the Catholic University at Louvain, has been guided by the ideas of the Ultramontane party, of which he is a leading man. On the contrary, the history penned by M. Vercamer is a work conceived in a liberal, philosophical, and truly elevated spirit. One of the most remarkable of all the books devoted to the history of this kingdom since 1830—that entitled 'Cinquante Ans de Liberté'—has been published by a society of authors who are Liberals in politics. M. Émile Grayson has devoted a special monograph to the question of official and private education. M. le Comte Goblet d'Alviella has produced a luminous and attractive picture in his history of political parties and their transformations since the year 1830. This book deserves to be recommended to the attention of foreign readers.

Flemish literature has not remained a stranger as regards the celebration of our Belgian cinquantième. Under the title 'Onze Dichters: eene Halve Eeuw Vlaamsche Poëzie' ('Our Poets: Half a Century of Flemish Poetry'), MM. Coopman and V. de la Montagne have published an anthology of the poets who since 1830 have contributed most to the renaissance of Flemish literature. The collection opens with an historical introduction, and its value is enhanced by portraits and fac-similes of autographs. On the whole, poetry is the most flourishing branch of Belgian literature written in the language of the Netherlands. Besides the recueils of MM. Bogaard, Ad. Beernaert, Stevens, Buyet, Ducins, and Van de Putte, we have to notice especially the 'Dichtwerken' ('Poetical Works') of Madame van Ackere, one of the veteran authors of Flemish poetry; also the charming book by M. Gentil Anthonis, 'Leven, Liefde, en Zingen' ('Life, Love, and Song'), and the fresh and original recueil, 'Liederen voor Groote en Kleine Kinderen' ('Songs for Children, Great and Little'), by M. Em. Hiel.

In prose our great novelist, Hendrik Conscience, has published two sketches, borrowed from recollections of his own life; M. Ern. Vander Ven continues to cultivate his own naturalistic style in his volume 'Uit het dagelijksch Leven' ('Out of our Daily Life'); MM. Teirlinck and Stijns, as joint authors, have written their novel 'Baas Colder' ('The Farmer Colder'); the posthumous edition of the novels of Ecrvisse is continued; and M. Smeekx proceeds with the publication of his 'Volledige Werken.'

As in every year dramatic literature supplies a numerous contingent. MM. Pieter Goiregat, Verschueren, H. Keurvels, G. Hendrickx, Suetens, de Geest, and others, have produced new dramas and comedies.

M. Emm. Roseels has published a new volume of his dramatic works. The best theatrical productions of the year we owe to M. Emiel van Goethem; these are his play 'Drie Oude Kameraden' ('Three Old Friends') and the charming proverb, 'Een Wolkje voor de Bruijloft' ('A Little Cloud before Marriage').

That vigorous association of Ghent, Het Willems-Fonds, which has some thirty affiliated sections in the principal towns of Flemish Belgium, and controls and directs the intellectual progress of our Teutonic population, has published its interesting 'Year-Book'; also a remarkable historical dissertation by M. L. De Rijcker on the municipal institutions of Ghent in the Middle Ages, and down to the time of the French annexation in 1794. MM. Nap. de Pauw and Julius Vuylsteke have continued the publication of the municipal accounts belonging to the epoch of Jacques van Artevelde. English specialists and others will do well not to neglect this rich mine of information respecting the history of the War of a Hundred Years in the times of the great burghers of Ghent and their ally Edward III. M. Edw. van Even has edited a Louvain chronicle of the sixteenth century, compiled by a contemporary writer named Willem Boonen.

The Studenten Almanak, a year-book compiled for the use of Flemish students at the University of Ghent, recommends itself by its freshness and audacity. This year it contains a study by M. Paul Fredericq on the university career of the late Tony Bergmann, one of our most original Flemish prose writers. He, with the poet Julius Vuylsteke and his friends, first led Flemish literature into the current of our modern liberal ideas. M. Julius Obrie has published a most weighty essay, 'De Nederlandsche Rechtspraak' ('The Juridical Language of the Netherlands').

M. Vanden Brande continues the publication of his remarkable work, 'Geschiedenis der Antwerpsche Schilderschool' ('History of the Antwerp School of Painting'), in which are found so many inedited details, gathered out of the archives of Antwerp, respecting the lives and the times of Matsys, Rubens, and all the other great masters of Antwerp. Last year we noticed the completion of a similar work by M. Max Rooses, which has been already translated into German (published at Munich), and of which an English translation will soon appear. This year the same author gives us, under the title 'Over de Alpen' ('Over the Alps'), a fascinating account of his latest artistic travels in Italy. Here we see treated with a master's hand, and with an originality of both thought and diction truly remarkable, several of the many æsthetic questions suggested by the palaces, the museums, and the thousand other works of art found in that incomparable land. This book by M. Max Rooses is indeed the most brilliant, as it is also the most solid, of all the Flemish literary works produced here during the year that is now passing away.

ÉMILE DE LAVELEYE—PAUL FREDERICQ.

BOHEMIA.

In Bohemia the epic has been the prevailing form of poetry during the year. Subjects connected with the history of the country, both present and past, have been the chief themes chosen, and, upon the whole, have been fairly handled; in individual cases it may even be said that some are excellent from an artistic point of view. Among the works based upon subjects of national interest are a cycle of narrative poems by Julius Zeyer, the famous novelist, published under the collective name of 'Vysehrad' (the Acropolis of Prague); and an epic by the eminent poet Svatopluk Cech, 'Václav z Michalovic' ('The Kneave of Michalovic'). Zeyer's work takes as its subject a cycle of legends from Bohemian history relating to the times of Libusa and Premysl; and the fortresses of Vysehrad on the Moldau, which forms the centre of all the Czech national legends, is the chief point of interest in Zeyer's verses. The several closely connected parts of the poem are named 'Libusa' (the daughter of Krok and the foundress of Prague), 'Zelený Vítěz' ('The Green Victor'), 'Vlasta' (the leader of the Amazons in the War of the Maidens), 'Ctirad' ('The Sacrifice of the War'), and 'Lumir' (the earliest Bohemian bard). Svatopluk Cech set himself the task of poetically remodelling the 'Václav z Michalovic,' which may be termed the climax of the entire poetry of Bohemia, belonging to that most terrible period in the history of the people which succeeded the battle of the White Mountain (November 8th, 1620). This is the sublimest but also the most difficult task that Bohemian history can propose to our national poetry. Václav z Michalovic is a pupil of the Jesuits, and a son of Bohuslav z Michalovic, who was executed after the unlucky issue of the battle of the White Mountain, and after he had become acquainted with the political and religious past history of his family. In the poem we have a description of the double conflict into which the hero falls, owing to the religious faith in which he has been brought up, and also owing to his admiration of some Spanish beauty in spite of his being destined to become a priest. These incidents give the poet an opportunity for exhibiting in the fullest light his eminent talent in the handling of epic subjects. We have a worthy pendant to this national epic in a poem which takes its theme from the Slavonic history of the immediate past, and which has been poetically remodelled by a lady writer, Eliška Krásnohorská, in her work 'K Slovanskému Jihu' ('To the Slavonic South'). The events and heroic deeds of the South Slavs in the late insurrection in the Herzegovina and the Russo-Turkish war have inspired the poetess and enabled her to produce a really noble narrative poem. In the form partly of a modern ballad, partly of a South Slavonic heroic poem (smes), Eliška Krásnohorská extols both the heroism of action (Montenegro) and the heroism of martyrdom (Bulgaria). The work of deliverance has its climax in a grand perspective view which the poetess sketches for the future; the laden balls that are gathered up from the battle-fields shall be recast into letters, and from these the future Slavonic culture shall take its rise. As descriptive of modern life, Svatopluk Cech has also published a cycle of epic poems entitled 'Ve Stínu Lípy' ('Under the Shade of the Lime Tree'). These are graceful and artistic idylls, depicting the village life of his native land. Adolf Hey-duk likewise has come forward with a most successful pendant to his last year's epic allegory, 'Deduv Odkaz' ('The Grandfather's Bequest'), in a work entitled 'Drevorubec' ('The Woodman'). This is a somewhat longer narrative poem describing life in the Böhmerwald, which with its very romantic, splendid, and yet, in part, awe-inspiring scenery, forms the scene of the exciting tale of the ruin of a family. Jaroslav Verchlický has during the past year written the second part of his 'Myth' ('The Myth'). In the first part (1878) this author took his poetic motives from stories connected with his native country, but in the second we have legends from other countries as well, which, however, owing to their humanitarian and spiritual subjects, have become the property of the whole civilized world. There are subjects from the Bible as well as from the ancients: 'Israfel', 'Narození Sakuntaly' ('The Birth of Sakuntala'), 'Smrt Aischyla' ('The Death of Aeschylus'), 'Sandalfon', 'Maria Egyptiaca', 'Pokání Don Juana' ('The Repentance of Don Juan'), 'Mythus o Vině' ('The Myth about Wine'), and 'Eloa'. Every one of these poems is an apotheosis of poetry and of poetic ideals, of which the love of woman, which overcomes all things, even God himself, is placed by Verchlický in the first rank. There appeared at the beginning of last year in the Slovak dialect, which is a branch of the literary language of Bohemia, a collection of poems with a distinct epic tendency and of true artistic value. A young singer, Vajanský, appeared for the first time before the literary world with a work named 'Tatry a More' ('The Carpathians and the Sea'), and, moreover, it has proved undoubtedly a success. The awakened Slavonic spirit in the North and South offered him good subjects for his powerful verse. The most approved of his pieces is 'Majak' ('The Beacon'). An older countryman of Vajanský's, John Botto, in a poem named 'Smrt Janosikova' ('The Death of Janosik'), has come forward with a specimen of the modern style of the national Slovak epic, as it is still to be found in the Carpathian mountains. It breathes a deeply mournful spirit, the result of the political subjection of the Slovaks; and this is the chief characteristic of Botto's poems.

In lyric poetry the best contributions of 1880 are those by Jaroslav Verchlický. His 'Eklogy a Písne' ('Eclogues and Songs') are an echo of a first and supremely happy love. A continuation of this same strain is met with in his last collection of poems, entitled 'Dojmy a Rozmýšl' ('Impressions and Fancies'), which give expression to a genuine feeling for lyric art. Of all the present writers in Bohemia, Verchlický is the one who has devoted most time to the poetic masterpieces of other nations, and by his very successful translations (of V. Hugo, Leopardi, Carducci, Leconte de Lisle, and Dante) has introduced them to the literature of his own country. One of the younger lyric writers, Otakar Mokry, in his book 'Jihoceské Melodie' ('South Bohemian Melodies'), gives us the impressions made upon his mind while wandering through the southern part of his native land. These are recollections of the days of Huss, the leading personages of the time (Huss, Zizka, Chelcicky) being men who belonged to that part of the country. By the publication of the literary remains of Bohdan Jelínek we are made acquainted with, and at the same time have to regret the loss of, a lyric writer of great refinement of feeling and æsthetic taste.

In dramatic matters a fresh phase of activity will be encouraged in Bohemia by the opening of the new national theatre. Schubert's 'Vok of Rozmberk', Emanuel Bozdech's 'Dobrodruzí' ('The Adventurer'), and Miroslav Krájčík's 'Jan Rohac z Dubé' ('John Rohac of Duba') are the best specimens of plays that this year's Czech literature has to offer.

Fiction has again, as in fact it has during the last decade, been cultivated with great zest, and, moreover, with decided success. At the head stands Alois Jirásek with his three historical novels, 'U Rytíru' ('Among the Knights'), 'Ráj Sveta' ('The World's Paradise'), and 'Obetovany' ('The Sacrificed Man'). By his side we have A. Smilovsky with his story of the present day, 'Nebeas' ('Heaven!'); Jos. Stolba's 'Alfonso Perer', a story describing life as it now is in Cuba; Julius Zeyer's 'Báje Soesana' ('Legends of the Soesans'), and his tale of the faithful friendship of Amis and Amil; Francis Herites's 'Arabesques and Sketches'; Svatopluk Cech's third volume of his 'Narratives'; and V. Benes Trebízky's 'Historical Pictures'.

There have appeared several new and valuable works in scientific literature during last year. Many of the Prague professors have been at work on their respective subjects—Krejci on geology, Borický on mineralogy, Čalakovský on botany, Fric on zoology. These and other investigators have contributed valuable papers to the archives for the general investigation of the country. Of other and independent works that have recently appeared I must mention Dr. Seydler's 'Principles of Theoretical Physics,' a book somewhat the same in extent and character as the English book by Thomson and Tait; Prof. Ant. Belohoubek's monographs relating to chemical technology and microscopic chemistry; and a 'Compendium of Organic Chemistry,' published conjointly by Dr. Milan Nevoile and B. Rayman. Dr. Fr. Studnicka is just beginning to publish a 'Geography,' astronomical, mathematical, and physical.

In history I have to mention the fourth volume of A. Gindely's comprehensive work on the 'Thirty Years' War.' Dr. Em. Holub's 'Seven Years in Africa' is an important addition to the list of books on travel. Philosophy is attended to in the most thorough and active manner by Dr. Jos. Durdík, and he has of late more particularly directed his energy to æsthetics. In his last work, 'The Æsthetics of Poetic Art,' the learned author most fully applies the general principles of the theory of beauty to poetic work. In his chapter on external form Dr. Durdík has, I am glad to say, successfully solved the old question respecting the relations between the quantitative (antique) and the accentuating (modern) prosody of Bohemian poetry, and has thereby put an end to controversy on the point.

F. SCRIVIA.

DENMARK.

Our literary activity has been by no means inconsiderable in 1880; still there are few decidedly remarkable books among the large number that have been published.

Early in the year the quarrel between the old tendencies in our poetry and criticism and the new, which has lasted for some ten years, broke out violently, owing to some depreciatory criticisms promulgated by C. Ploug, a journalist and poet belonging to the former section. The paper warfare was waged with vigour, especially by the latter party, our so-called "literary Left," headed by the poets Schandorph and Drachmann; but, like most struggles of the kind, it had no particular result, and this all the more because political differences were introduced. Whatever be one's æsthetic principles, no unprejudiced person can deny that the younger set of writers—the Realists as they are styled (a name that denotes little) in opposition to the Romanticists—possess more fertility and greater gifts than their rivals. Their main characteristics are a habit of free thought, an effort at emancipation from the traditional ideals and authorities, religious and social, as well as a fresher and more vigorous style, and often a partiality for the portrayal of the life and ways of the lower classes of the community. The faults of their writings are an exaggeration of the tendencies I have mentioned and a frequent lack of artistic compression.

In lyrical and epic poetry the literature is more abundant than usual; still the books published are most of them either collections of older poems or insignificant attempts of beginners. The numerous poems of N. F. S. Grundtvig, the influential poet and theologian who died a few years ago, are now being issued in a collected shape, and will fill eight volumes, the first of which has appeared. His psalms are not included in this edition, but a supplement containing them is now in type. A small volume of posthumous, mostly unimportant, poems of our famous storyteller H. C. Andersen has come out; C. Molbech has brought out a new and enlarged issue of his verses; and E. Bøgh, esteemed as the writer of successful vaudevilles and humorous songs, has begun an edition of a definitive selection of his numerous verses in three volumes. Most of them are witty satires in light forms. Chr. Richard has published, under the title of 'Picture Texts,' a collection of his fugitive verses in illustration of pictures. Among the new volumes of verse H. Drachmann's again take the foremost place. His fairy tale, 'Eastward from the Sun and Westward from the Moon,' and his national epic, 'Tordenskjold,' recounting the life of our renowned naval hero of the last century, are deserving of almost unqualified praise, and while the former work delights the reader by an ingenuous and fanciful treatment of the fairy tale in charming verse, he admires the latter for its fresh, impetuous handling of a subject especially suited to the idiosyncrasies of the poet. There is also much that is remarkable both in form and content in his extensive collection of lyrics called 'Youth,' but there are also, unfortunately, a number of polemical and spiteful pieces and confessions of purely personal interest that had better have been excluded. Finally, this untiring writer has also produced a small book in prose, 'Lars Kruse,' in which he endeavours to obtain due recognition for the services of a Jutland fisherman of this name, who has saved many shipwrecked persons; and a version of Byron's 'Don Juan,' the first that has appeared in Danish. 'Childe Harold' also has just been translated with success by Ad. Hansen. I have further to mention a collection of 'Romances and Songs,' by Carl Andersen, and a narrative poem, 'The Franciscan,' by the author who adopts the nom de plume "Diodoros." In spite of some beautiful passages and profound thoughts, it cannot, as a whole, be compared with 'The Eternal Strife,' by the same author, of which I spoke so highly last year.

In drama we are as badly supplied in 1880 as in 1879. Only a couple of attempts by young writers have appeared, which were, however, not acted, and on which I have no space to dwell. On the other hand, novels are in this as in every other country the favourite branch of literature both with authors and the public. However, "many are called, but few are chosen." In fact, of the numerous fictions—mostly historical—published this year, hardly one is a success. I may mention an elaborate one by Carit Etlar, 'Salomon Booteman,' which describes the adventurous deeds of Tordenskjold and his companions, but, while possessing a share of the well-known merits of its author—a gift of narrative and a power of drawing humorous characters in ordinary life—is destitute of unity and connexion. In H. F. Ewald's 'Short Tales' are to be found very lifelike scenes from Danish life in olden times; his larger romance, 'Anna Hardenberg,' I must this time content myself with merely naming. 'Five Tales,' by Schandorph, are often fresh and agreeable, and contain good descriptions of character, and the longer story, 'Little People,' shows power of acute observation and intelligent sympathy with "little people," but is almost too commonplace and objective; 'Sketches of Life and Tales,' by a clergyman, I. Friis, are sensible and unpretentious; 'Five Tales,' by Johanne Schiørring, and a more elaborate work, 'Cinderella,' by Elfride Fibiger, are both of them pretty, but destitute of higher qualities; finally, there is a new volume of popular tales by Thyregod. Of the younger novelists who have come to the front of late and are represented in the records of 1880, K. Gjellerup is unquestionably the most distinguished. His first production, 'An Idealist,' of which I spoke highly last Christmas, was followed by a novel called 'Young Denmark,' which, though full of talent and abounding in happy passages, was justly charged with indiscretion and want of satisfactory development. His last work, on the contrary, 'Antigones: a Story of the Second Century,' contains within the limits of a comparatively simple plot an interesting picture of the motley religious and social life of Rome and the East at the period named. It is full of proofs of clever studies and unusual gifts of description. The main fault of our younger writers, from which Gjellerup is not free, is the strongly marked Tendenz which too often makes of the leading personages impossible characters or lifeless shadows. These defects are more conspicuous in the novels of Secher, 'Husbands,' and Fr. Elbert, 'Fire and Ashes.' 'Sad Melodies,' a collection of sketches by H. Bang, are mostly immature imitations, and I can but name a longer story of his, 'Hopeless Generations,' which has just come out. In some measure in opposition to the modern tendency stands M. Rosing's novel, 'A Romanticist,' but the idealized hero is a failure. To these should be added a rather clever novel dealing with Tycho Brahe and his times, 'Evil Stars,' by A. Hertz, and a valuable contribution to folk-lore, the collection of 'Sagas of Jutland,' by E. T. Christensen.

Of strictly historical works there are but few. The most important, or, at any rate, that which will find the most readers, is the 'History of Denmark and Norway at the Close of the Sixteenth Century,' begun by Troels Lund. Three volumes of it have already appeared, and depict in a lively and attractive, if not always critical, fashion the country and manners of the time. I have further to mention a book on 'Valdemar IV. (Atterdag),' by Reinhardt, and a new volume of O. Nielsen's meritorious 'History of Copenhagen.' Of new biographies and autobiographies the most remarkable are O. Vaupell's 'Peder Griffenfeldt,' a biography of the renowned Danish statesman of the seventeenth century, of which only the first volume has as yet appeared; a book by J. Hansen, important for the history of recent politics, which has been translated into English, 'Fifteen Years Abroad'; finally, three volumes of the 'Posthumous Papers' of our great theologian and philosopher, Søren Kierkegaard. To the history of culture and literature belong H. Schwanenflugel's short but clear 'History of Ancient Civilization,' which is not yet completed; a popular 'History of Danish Literature,' by Winkel Horn; a second instalment of a book I have previously praised, 'Out of the Forties,' by O. Borchsenius, and 'Literary Feuilletons,' by the same author. In his 'Realism and Realists' H. Bang has given interesting accounts of our newest poets, and sketches of our most noted actors are contained in 'The Danish Stage' of E. Brandes, a spirited but rather one-sided work. V. Hoekjar, who a little time ago wrote a description of a 'Journey in Greece,' has now issued a 'Journey in China, Japan, and India.' The noted artist Elisabeth Jerichau has begun a vivacious and richly illustrated narrative of her extensive travels.

In theology and philosophy there is but little to mention. Sermons by Bishop Martensen and by Grundtvig, belonging to his last years, have been published. Heegard has written a useful treatise 'On Education,' not yet finished. The writer who takes the nom de plume of "Theodoros" has brought out a pamphlet, 'Religion and Children,' in which he objects to the inculcation of dogma in the religious instruction given in schools.

Of popular works in natural science I can mention only 'The Forces of Nature,' by A. Paulsen, and 'Descriptions from the Animal Kingdom,' by Lütken.

VICCO PETERSEN.

FRANCE.

SINCE my last yearly résumé nothing has appeared worthy of much notice in the sphere of metaphysical science; nothing, I mean, sufficiently original in character and in style to command attention and to challenge criticism. It seems as if even the last followers of Victor Cousin had said their say, and as if the sceptre of philosophy had passed for ever into the hands of positivists and materialists. The crusade against religion, and more particularly against Christianity, which had, at any rate, a scientific character in the writings of MM. Havet and Vacherot, becomes simply ridiculous when advocated by MM. Dufay ('La Légende du Christ') and Wilfrid de Fonvielle ('Les Miracles devant la Science'). M. Ernest Renan's Hibbert Lectures, followed by his sketch of Marcus Aurelius, deserve, as may well be imagined, to be singled out of the mass of books recently published on ecclesiastical history, and they contain on the relations between Christianity and Roman civilization some remarks which, if not exactly new, are put in a popular and very clear form. Whilst M. Naville defends with much learning and eloquence the great religious truths which free-thinkers are assailing on all sides ('Jésus Christ'), the principal systems brought forward at various times and in various countries to explain the mysteries of creation and of man's place in the general order of things are carefully investigated, though not always without a certain polemical bias. Thus M. Abel Hovelacque's excellent volume on Zoroaster and the 'Avesta,' the best account I know of Zoroastrianism, would have lost nothing in scientific value if the author had left out his theological crotchets. M. Sayous ('Jésus Christ d'après Mahomet') discusses a curious point in the history of the relations between the Jews and the Arabs, and of the consequences which these relations produced, so far as the development of Islamism is concerned. The religion of the ancient Egyptians seems still to excite the same interest as it did in the days of Champollion, Young, and Rosellini. M. Pierret ('Essai sur la Mythologie Égyptienne'), starting from a point of view entirely opposite to that of M. Maspero, considers the Egyptian system of mythology as being the degradation of primitive monotheism, whilst the translator of Prof. Ebers, on the other hand ('L'Égypte'), sees in it an advance upon a primitive form of heathenism. M. François Lenormant carries back his researches further still. He deals with the very origins of humanity, and in a learned work, some portions of which have already been contributed to reviews and magazines ('Des Origines de l'Histoire d'après la Bible'), he compares the various incidents given in the book of Genesis with the traditions which we gather from the writings and monuments of the Persians, Assyrians, and Babylonians. Notwithstanding the very explicit declaration of faith prefixed by M. Lenormant to his interesting volume, I question very much whether his critical examination and interpretation of the sacred text will be accepted by the few remaining champions of the old orthodox school. It is most encouraging, at all events, to see the progress which has been made during the last quarter of a century in the study of Oriental literature, and those amongst my readers who are anxious to see the results obtained could hardly do better than turn to the recueil of articles for which we are indebted to the late M. Jules Mohl ('Vingt-sept Ans d'Histoire des Études Orientales'), and which, after having enriched the pages of the Journal Asiatique, now come before us, like those of M. Garcin de Tassy, in a permanent shape. When I have mentioned M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire's dissertation on Aristotle's metaphysical system I shall have exhausted pretty nearly the subject of philosophical literature in its serious form, leaving aside books of a strictly theological nature, which have never, perhaps, been more plentiful than they are just now.

The nineteenth century might well be called the age of cyclopædias. Dictionaries of every kind abound, and scarcely a branch of science can be named which has not been cut up in alphabetical order, and made more attractive by the help of woodcuts, steel engravings, and all the appliances of pictorial skill. Take, for instance, the new archaeological glossary compiled by M. Victor Gay. It is, so far as I can judge from the specimen issued, an exhaustive répertoire of mediæval and Renaissance art, and will utterly supersede the ponderous and obsolete labours of Ducange, Dom Mabillon, and Dom Montfaucon. What M. Gay is doing so admirably for the epoch included between the division of the Roman Empire and the beginning of the sixteenth century, M. Saglio has for several years been carrying on for classical antiquity. It seems a great pity that this gentleman's 'Dictionnaire des Antiquités Grecques et Romaines' should be issued in livraisons appearing at such distant intervals, and that we should only now have the seventh fasciculus of a work which made its first start nearly ten years ago. Can it really be that we shall never live to see the last instalment either of M. Saglio's dictionary or of M. Vivien de Saint-Martin's splendid atlas, two parts of which make us, by their beautiful finish, their accuracy, and their completeness, long to possess a work fit to be placed on the same line as those of Spruner or of Kiepert? The geographical dictionary on which M. Vivien de Saint-Martin is engaged proceeds at a somewhat more rapid rate, for the first volume is now entirely finished, and as the collaboration of the wood engraver is not required here, greater speed can more easily be obtained. M. Élisée Reclus and his geographical labours naturally suggest themselves to me at this point, though the 'Nouvelle Géographie Universelle' does not belong to the class of lexicons. The learned author has taken leave of the continent of Europe, and introduces us now to Asiatic Russia. Finally, I shall complete my review of geographical publications by an allusion to the usual year-book, which also bore in years gone by the name of M. de Saint-Martin, but is now carried on, with equal success and equal talent, by MM. Lâger and Maunoir. But revenons à nos moutons, that is to say, to our dictionaries. The 'Biographie Universelle des Musiciens' belongs to this class; it was a standard work even before M. Pouglin had undertaken to correct the unavoidable errors into which the original editor, M. Fétis, had fallen, and to put up the compilation to the present time. If you are hesitating about the choice of a career you cannot do better than consult M. Charton's 'Dictionnaire des Professions'; if you want to know the mysteries of education, the history of the University of France, and all the details of school-books, school discipline, and school methods, take up M. Buisson's 'Dictionnaire de Pédagogie.' M. Vapereau's excellent 'Dictionnaire des Contemporains,' M. Lalanne's 'Dictionnaire de l'Histoire de France,' and M. Bouillet's 'Dictionnaire Universel d'Histoire et de Géographie' have appeared in a revised form. Nor must I forget the third fasciculus of the Abbé Ulysse Chevalier's 'Répertoire des Sources Historiques du Moyen Âge'; it takes us as far as the letter O, and one more instalment will complete the bio-bibliographical part. Another new archaeological lexicon remains to be noticed, namely, M. Ruelle's 'Bibliographie Générale des Gaules,' the first livraison of which is published. When complete it is intended to illustrate the history, the topography, and the antiquities of Gaul, from the earliest times to the end of the fifth century.

The colossal dictionary of mediæval French begun by M. Godefroy is, within its special limits, destined to rival M. Littré's celebrated work in size. I cannot say that it altogether comes up to the standard of absolute perfection, but it will certainly cast into the shade the lexicon of Sainte-Palaye, which, excellent for the time when it was composed, is now quite as obsolete as Roquefort's, and should have been allowed to remain in its MS. state. The discovery of old texts and the labours of grammarians founded upon the data supplied by the science of comparative philology have rendered entirely useless even the books of M. de Chevallet and M. Gustave Faliot, much more the erudition of eighteenth century scholars. From glossaries and vocabularies to the writings which they are designed to illustrate the transition is easy, and here I have to notice the valuable publications of the Société des Anciens Textes. This year the second volume of the Old Testament mysteries and miracle plays and the chronicle of Mont Saint Michel in Normandy bear witness to the Society's earnestness, and to the sound scholarship of the editors it employs. It would perhaps be desirable that greater despatch might be realized in the issuing of the various livraisons, and that the annual instalments were delivered with more regularity to the subscribers; thus the interesting 'Saint Voyage de Jérusalem,' published only a few weeks ago, was really due as far back as 1878. This, however, is a mere administrative detail, which I trust will speedily be remedied. In the meanwhile the reprints of the French mediæval dramas have led to the good result of producing a history of dramatic literature. Just as M. Félix Godefroy has replaced Lacurne de Sainte-Palaye, so M. Petit de Julleville bids fair to drive the brothers Parfait's 'Histoire Générale du Théâtre Français' out of the field. The two volumes now before me contain not only an admirable history of mysteries and miracle plays, but a catalogue raisonné of all these productions, so far at least as I am acquainted with them. The second and thoroughly revised edition of M. Léon Gautier's 'Épopées Françaises' must also be mentioned here as a proof that the literature of the Middle Ages continues to be studied with unflagging enthusiasm. Unfortunately, in some minds an admiration for the old chansons de geste, the fabliaux, sermones, ballads, &c., is indissolubly connected with political and ecclesiastical tendencies more or less reactionary, and M. F. Brunetière, for instance, has protested loudly and repeatedly in the Revue des Deux Mondes against what he calls the mediæval craze. M. Brunetière, whose articles collected in one volume (Études Critiques sur l'Histoire de la Littérature Française) have at once assigned to him a distinguished position in the front rank of reviewers, reserves his admiration for the masterpieces of the last two centuries; he belongs to the school of Boileau, La Harpe, M. Désiré Nisard, and M. de Sacy; his standard of taste is the 'Art Poétique,' and from that standpoint, of course, the whole literary crop anterior to Montaigne has no value whatever. It is tolerably certain that M. Brunetière's wholesale condemnation will not be endorsed by the majority of critics; certainly not by MM. Paul Meyer and Gaston Paris, whose learned periodical Romania is so full of interesting documents on mediæval literature in the various branches of the Romance family of languages. M. Littré, too, is surely entitled to a hearing on the side of Langue d'Oïl compositions, and I take the opportunity of just mentioning here the Études et Glanures in which old French lore has supplied the illustrious Academician with the materials of important and suggestive articles.

Periodical literature in its steady increase (the first numbers of the Revue Égyptologique and of the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions are now before me) supplies the scientific reader also with abundant materials for a better knowledge of history in all its branches, and I need only name the Revue Celtique, Romania, the Revue Historique, and the Revue des Questions Historiques as well-furnished storehouses of solid and thoroughly-digested information. Foreign literature has not been neglected this year: M. Demogot, whose excellent 'Histoire de la Littérature Française' is so deservedly popular, introduces us in a couple of handy volumes to Italy and Spain on the one side, and to Germany and England on the other; M. Hallberg contributes to M. Lemerre's useful library a short review of English and Slavonic literature; M. Paul Stapfer's 'Études sur la Littérature Française,' belonging to the same class as M. de Pontmartin's 'Samedis,' may be named here, and also M. Schérer's sketch of Diderot, which would be unexceptionable if the author had taken more account of what English and German critics have had to say about D'Alembert's friend and collaborator.

In the sphere of political history the most important works I have to mention belong to comparatively modern times, for M. Duruy's 'Histoire des Romains,' the third volume of which is only just out, can hardly be considered as a new production, although the beautiful illustrations lavished upon it have almost entirely altered its character. Ecclesiastical history is still worthily represented by M. Victor Palmé's reprint of the 'Gallia Christiana,' the bulky folios of which appear in slow but steady regularity. M. Fournier gives us, under the title 'Les Officialités au Moyen Âge,' an admirable history of the ecclesiastical tribunals existing in France between 1180 and 1328; to the same class of writing belongs M. Noël Valois's monograph on Gualelmus Arvernensis (Guillaume d'Auvergne), who was Bishop of Paris at the beginning of the thirteenth century, and borrowed chiefly from the Arabs the mystical character of his philosophy. After an interval of many years M. Barthélemy Hauréau publishes at last the second division of an important history of scholasticism, taking us down to the fourteenth century, when mediæval institutions are beginning to give way in the sphere both of politics and of thought. It is worth while asking the Middle Ages to give an account of themselves and to see what were really the conditions under which, in those times, society carried on its daily task. This has been carefully done by M. de Calonne in his 'Vie Municipale au XV^e Siècle,' and although his observations are confined to the districts of Northern France, yet we may fairly draw from them inferences as to the remaining part of the kingdom. But, after all, can any amount of learned inquiry and sifting of evidence be put for a single moment in comparison with the photographs, if I may use such an expression, we find in the memoirs of contemporary chroniclers and annalists? There is Philippe de Commines, for instance, whose immortal autobiography gives us the fifteenth century to the life, with its marked and broadly defined contrasts; Louis XI. and Charles the Rash, statecraft and a spurious kind of chivalry, the philosophy of history as opposed to the naïveté of Villehardouin or the brilliancy of Froissart. M. B. Chantelaine, who has been fortunate enough to consult a MS. formerly belonging to Diane de Poitiers, gives us a new edition of Commines, plentifully illustrated, accompanied by notes, glossaries, indexes, &c., and in every respect worthy of a conspicuous place in the series of historical works which includes already Joinville, Guillaume de Tyr, and Villehardouin. The previous labours of M. Chantelaine had been concentrated chiefly upon the minority of Louis XIV. and the turbulent Coadjutor of Paris; there is no doubt that the two volumes this gentleman has published on the Cardinal de Retz will be completed by further instalments. In the meanwhile M. Chéruel has finished his 'Histoire de France sous la Minorité de Louis XIV.,' and M. Zeller, carrying out an idea started some years ago by M. Cousin, undertakes to rehabilitate in public opinion the Constable de Luynes, who after enjoying a short tenure of power as the favourite of Louis XIII. was systematically calumniated by the champions and admirers of Cardinal Richelieu. Viscount de Baillon's monograph on Madame de Montmorency belongs to the same epoch. History numbers its "good hatters" by hundreds, and one of the busiest tasks of our generation is to whitewash, or, speaking in a less invidious manner, to put in their proper light, the victims of the generation before. Thus Saint-Simon is one of the memoir writers who have allowed themselves to be most unjustifiably carried away by prejudice; now we can discuss his appreciations en pleine connaissance de cause, and correct them whenever necessary, thanks to the labours of M.

A. de Boilliale, who has begun for MM. Hachette's 'Grands Écrivains' an edition of the memoirs, supplemented from Dangeau's journal and from all the other sources of information, either printed or MS., which our libraries can yield. The Saint-Simon portfolios, too, till lately stupidly withheld from students by the authorities of the French Foreign Office, are beginning to tell their tale, and M. Fagère has found in them the materials for two interesting volumes. M. Bourelly writes the life of Marshal Fabert, a soldier whose career is the best illustration of the difficulties of every kind which retainers met with under the reign of Louis XIV. in their attempt to do their duty. The present volume ends with Fabert's appointment as governor of Sedan in the year 1658. The Archives de la Bastille continue to furnish M. Ravaisson with evidence of the most terrible kind against the grand monarque and his system of government. We have now arrived at the last few years of the reign, and as we go on we find the king's police more and more tracassière. Jansenists and Huguenots, foreign spies and outspoken journalists, are closely watched, and when caught immediately punished, yet the general discontent has arrived at such a pitch that seditious meetings are held almost within a stone's throw of the grim fortress. The day of retribution was coming, but previous to its dawning there was an era of songs and vaudevilles, a number of which, preserved in Clément's collection, are now reprinted for the edification of readers who are fond of the anecdotal side of history. The 'Chansonnier Historique,' annotated by M. Raunié, and of which four volumes are now out, by its gossiping character reminds us of the 'Registres-Journaux' of Pierre de L'Estoile, still in course of publication and invaluable as a source of information respecting the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Amongst the political characters alluded to in the satirical pieces of M. Raunié's collection is the Marquis d'Argenson, who held the important post of Minister for Foreign Affairs under Louis XV., and whose biography has lately been written by M. Zévort.

For the history of the Revolutionary epoch and of the last century I have also a few publications of varying importance to mention. The interesting memoirs of Prince Metternich and of Madame de Rémusat hold, of course, the most prominent place, but I must not forget the three volumes of biography devoted to Marshal Davout by his daughter, Madame de Blocquville, nor M. Jung's 'Bonaparte et son Temps.' This latter work, taken up by an account of Napoleon's early career, is the result of careful investigations among the French archives, and is only the first instalment of what promises to be a valuable publication. M. Lanfrey's severe attack upon the petit caporal was sure, however well founded, to produce a reaction; M. Amédée Edmond Blanc has led the movement in a work meant to show the merits of the civil and administrative institutions of the first emperor. The library of memoirs edited by M. de Lescure receives a fresh addition in the shape of a handsome volume containing the autobiography of the Marquis de Ferrières; the correspondence of the well-known Greek scholar Coray is full of interesting details on the Reign of Terror; and finally I have to mention the monographs of Dr. Robinet ('Le Procès des Dantonistes'); and M. Dubost ('Danton et la Politique Contemporaine') on one of the leading characters of the French Revolution. M. Caro's 'Fin du Dix-huitième Siècle' deals chiefly with literary characters and social sketches, but M. Wallon, taking up the work left unfinished by the late M. Mortimer-Ternaux, unfolds before us the appalling events which marked the rule of the Committee of Public Safety. On more recent times we have M. du Bled's rather one-sided history of Louis Philippe, and M. Thureau-Dangin's view of the connexion between Church and State during the era of the "July Government." The parliamentary speeches of M. Thiers and M. Gambetta bring us to contemporary events, and the year-book issued by M. Savary ('Histoire de l'Année 1879') is a very successful attempt to condense and arrange in a methodical and easy shape a great deal of useful information. Foreign history—I mean foreign from the French point of view—is represented chiefly by M. Fournier's scholarly life of Philip II., King of Spain, M. Albert du Boy's history of Catherine of Aragon, M. Louis Blanc's 'Dix Ans de l'Histoire d'Angleterre,' and Rousseau Saint-Hilaire's history of Spain, the last two volumes of which have been lately published. The duodecimo for which we are indebted to Madame de Witt ('M. Guizot dans sa Famille') is a fitting supplement to the illustrious statesman's memoirs; and M. Paul Lacroix, whose 'Récits de l'Histoire de France' remind me of Sir Walter Scott's 'Tales of a Grandfather,' has given some curious details of Madame de Krudener, the mystic arcturienne of the Holy Alliance. Illustrated works abound, as usual, with the return of the Christmas season (M. Marne's 'Saint Martin,' M. Charles Yriarte's 'Florence,' Madame de Witt's abridgment of Froissart's chronicles, &c.), and also publications of a less ambitious character, intended for schools, and written for the purpose either of vulgarizing the teachings of science (M. Hémond's 'Les Infiniment Petits'), or of relating in an attractive manner the life of great men ('Vie de Kléber,' 'Vie de Bayart,' by D'Aubigné). I have not forgotten the excellent series of memoirs and documents published by the Société de l'Histoire de France ('Gestes des Evêques de Cambrai,' 'Mémoires de Goulas,' &c.), the new edition of 'La France Protestante,' M. Charavay's elegant and tasteful reprints of curious documents, and the learned essays on various points of archaeology contributed by the pupils of the schools which the French Government maintains at Rome and Athens; but want of space obliges me to leave many items unnoticed, and to confine myself to a bare mention of the principal publications.

In the domains of imagination and fancy, on the other hand, there is very little of real importance to record, although I cannot observe any falling off in the way of quantity. M. Sardou's 'Daniel Rochat,' M. de Bornier's 'Noces d'Attila,' and M. Deroulède's 'La Moabite' have been the three dramatic events of the year. M. Zola's 'Roman Naturaliste' has fallen quite flat after the scandal of 'Nana,' nor is there much to be said in favour of the 'Soirées de Médan.' Henry Gréville ('La Cité Ménéral') and

MM. Erckmann-Chatrian ('Le Grandpère Lebigre,' 'Un Vieux de la Vieille') still hold their own in the first rank of contemporary novelists, and M. Victor Hugo does not allow us to forget that the immortal poet of the 'Feuilles d'Automne' has lost nothing of his vigour. Whilst he represents genius of the highest order, M. Alphonse Karr, his fellow soldier in the romanticist crusade, is still the embodiment of wit, humour, and strong common sense. The 'Livre de Bord,' M. Sainte-Beuve's correspondence (a supplement to which is now out), Alexandre Dumas's memoirs, and George Sand's 'Histoire de ma Vie,' will certainly remain the most interesting pièces justificatives relating to the literary history of France during our own time. The list of reprints would alone fill up a long article. It includes authors of the sixteenth century ('L'Heptameron,' by Marguerite de Valois), of the grand siècle (Molière, La Fontaine, La Bruyère), and of the present day (Paul Louis Courier, Chateaubriand, &c.). MM. Hachette's collection, "Les Grands Écrivains," is more than a reprint, as one can see by looking over the last two instalments (Molière, vol. v., and Cardinal de Retz, vol. v.), where a large number of illustrative documents have been introduced. M. François Victor Hugo's translation of Shakespeare has reached its thirteenth volume, and M. Déprez's literal rendering of Charles Lamb's essays will familiarize the French public with a writer till now very little known on the other side of the Channel.

GUSTAVE MASSON.

GERMANY.

GERMANY is the land where, as Goethe says, "every one reads." In no other country is the proportion of those who cannot read and write so small—scarcely a half per cent. And since, as the poet goes on to say, there are many who take a book in hand only

I'm lesend darüber ein zweites zu schreiben, the yearly increase of literary productivity, if not of literary excellence, gradually creates a flood of books which threatens to become a deluge.

Poetry and science, amusing literature and instructive reading, have like share therein. In both branches, as may be supposed, the modest contingent of works of real imagination or learning is overwhelmed by a mass of ephemeral and popular effusions.

Two notable contemporaries, both belonging to a literary period now almost extinct, have this year come before the public for the first time in collected editions of their poetical works. The one, George Büchner, long since dead, belonged to the band of youthful political enthusiasts whom the reign of terror that prevailed in Germany after the French revolution of July, and its echoes in Heine and at Frankfurt, drove to seek a refuge abroad, and either spend long weary years in exile, or find, like Büchner, an early grave. The other, Ludwig August Frankl, entered in 1880 his seventieth year, and is one of the few surviving representatives of the era of literary suppression, which down to 1848 weighed most heavily on the most lofty and earnest spirits in Germany, and especially in Austria under Metternich's rule. The censorship of those days forced poets to take refuge from the effervescence of the present in the shadows of the past, or, like Rückert and Hammer-Purgstall, to forsake German themes in favour of the folk-lore of Persia or India or Turkey. George Büchner, the whilom Giessen student and Burschenschafter, lives in German literature as the author of the tragedy 'Julius von Tarent'; I. A. Leisewitz only through one work, 'Danton's Tod,' a play written in his twenty-second year. But the verdict of Lessing, "He has like a lioness brought only one cub into the world," may be applied to him. In tendency, as well as in poetical form, pathos of characterization, and fiery expression, 'Danton's Tod' resembles very closely 'The Robbers' of Schiller. Revolutionary heroism, however, appears to have passed from the romantic half-lights of the German student world and the Bohemian forests into the blood-red morning light of the historical revolution. Whether the foaming must of the youth who longed to pull down throne and altar would in riper years have cleared as Schiller's did, and become a noble wine enduring for centuries, is a point that the early death of the writer left for ever unsettled. A fragment of another ambitious drama found among the author's papers has been published for the first time by his editor, the novelist K. E. Franzos. It resembles its precursor in spirit and form. Ludwig August Frankl, like so many German writers since Heine and Boerne, a Jew by birth, in so far deserves a notable place among literary Hebrews that he has not only, like B. Auerbach, remained a Jew in creed, but has also celebrated Judaism in epic and lyric verse, as L. Kompert and K. E. Franzos have done in novels and tales. His poetical tale 'Der Primator,' a darkly coloured picture of Christian hatred of the Jews, is a remarkable supplement to Heine's enthralling fragment 'Der Rabbi von Bacharach.' His Eastern legends, proverbs, and pictures of travel deserve a place by the side of the gems with which Rückert, Hammer-Purgstall, and Bodenstedt have enriched German literature. On the other hand, his epics 'Colombo,' 'Don Juan d'Austria,' but especially the 'Habsburglied,' in spite of the smoothness of the language and the bold gorgeousness of the descriptions, bear the impress of the Metternich period and of the repressive system under which they saw the light, and which forced the poet to seek compensation in purity and neatness of expression for the lack of free ebullient life.

To the harvest of the past follows the sowing of the younger and youngest generations. Three poets who formerly, upon the lamentable failure of the first efforts after German unity in St. Paul's Church at Frankfurt, almost simultaneously stepped forward and proclaimed a return to the romantic days of knights and minstrels—Oscar v. Redwitz, Otto Roquette, and Julius Rodenberg—have again come together. Otto Roquette, the author of 'Waldmeisters Brautfahrt,' and Julius Rodenberg, the once youthful and sonorous singer, remain, in spite of the locks that meanwhile have grown grey, their own selves, that is, eternally youthful. The third, the writer of the maiden 'Amaranth,' once extolled as the revival of the Christian troubadour, who used to carry from drawing-room to drawing-room a lute suspended from an asure band, has changed. In the history of the monk Odilo, who, in consequence of an inward spiritual strife, flies from the cloister and enters the life of the world, he has given a poetical account of his own conversion from being an Ultramontane and a foe of the Empire to being a Nationalist and a herald of the new Ghibelline Empire.

As there are aloeas that bloom but once, so there are poets who become and remain celebrated for one song if it passes into the mouths of the people. Of this kind was the amiable poet Julius Mosen, whose collected works have been published this year by his son with a memoir prefixed. Mosen's thoughtful epic 'Ahasuerus,' and also his vigorous tragedies 'Kaiser Otto III.' and 'Rienzi,' are forgotten by the German reading public; but 'Die letzten Zehn vom vierten Regiment' and the 'Lied von Andreas Hofer' are sung and will be sung—often without the author's name being known—so far as "die deutsche Zunge klingt," on both sides of the Atlantic, and are now to be found in every German song-book. The same may be said of the Prussian ex-Minister of Public Worship, Heinrich von Muehler, who has left an evil name behind him as a reactionary both in Church and State. His numerous poems collected this year are known to nobody, while his drinking song 'Grad aus dem Wirthshaus,' which dates from the golden period of the early Burschenherrlichkeit, has been for half a century trotted forth wherever "bemoste Häupter" and "alte Herren," after the good old fashion, swallowed incredible quantities of beer or wine.

The Dionysiac frenzy, translated from classical Greek to student German, has made the author of 'Gaudeamus' and of the ever thirsty "Junker von Rodenstein," Victor Scheffel, the pet of the drinking public, and the chosen model of the "fahrenden Poeten." Arthur Fitger, the poet of the "Fahrenden Leute," adopts in the collection he has published this year, 'Winternächte,' an earnest tone, as becomes the author of a work remarkable for its tendency and form, such as is his tragedy 'Die Hexe.' Julius Wolff, the author of the 'Wilder Jäger,' a piece which rapidly attained a great popularity, has followed it up with a 'Tannhäuser,' couched in a similarly romantic strain. Rudolf Baumbach, the most gifted of the many imitators of Scheffel, has, under the title of 'Frau Holde,' the German name of "Lady Venus" in the saga of his native Thuringia, enriched the poetical treasury of the German people with a poem which in its subject matter is a variation of the legend of 'Zlatorog,' which he published some years ago, but, from its spontaneity of tone and musical form, belongs to the few pearls of this year's literature.

Compared with this Bacchic tumult, the 'Lieder der Freude' of Siegfried Lipiner, which strive after depth, and the rather turgid as well as ambitious, but somewhat incomprehensible 'Weihgesänge' of the once impressionable Adolf v. Schack, seem to be inspired by Orpheus. But that, in spite of this mystic origin, not in secret darkness, but, according to the old saying, in wine is wisdom to be found, has been again gloriously shown by Fr. Bodenstedt in his newest collection of sayings, the lays and aphorisms of Omar Chadjah, an undoubted relation of Mirza Schaffy of happy memory. The poet made a tour this year in the United States, and as a reader of his own verses gained the applause of all the German settlers in America. The latter do not content themselves with feting the poets and poetry of the Fatherland, but they begin, as the poems of the German-American Caspar Bats show, to write for themselves. The Germans of the Transatlantic republic thus tread the path which the Germans of republican Switzerland, to their honour and profit, have never quitted. In spite of centuries of political separation, the German citizens of Switzerland have formed, in a literary point of view, a section of the great German nation ever since the days of Salomon Gessner and Albrecht v. Haller. The current year, too, has produced a new German lyric poet of Swiss nationality, Rudolf Niggeler; and Ernst Heller's collection of 'Singers in Helvetia's Valleys' bears witness to the goodly group of German poets living in the land between the Rhine and the Alps, many of whom, such as the Byronic Ferdinand von Schmidt (of Berne), August Corrodi (of Winterthur), Alfred Hartmann (of Soleure), &c., have long been in good repute in Germany.

To the drama of this year belongs Arthur Fitger's tragedy 'Die Hexe,' not, indeed, by date of composition, but by date of representation. The author, a native of Lower Saxony, has taken his material, scene, and customs from the same powerful, original East Frisian race from which the remarkable dramatic sketcher of character, Heinrich Kruse, has derived the plot and characters of his play 'Die Gräfin.' Trifling circumstances, such as the recurrence of the same or slightly altered names, betray the fact that 'Die Gräfin' has not been without influence on Fitger's tragedy. On the other hand, the conception of the plot as well as the delineation of the characters and the curt, dramatic prose are original features. The heroine is a Frisian châtelaine who, under the guidance of a Jewish philosopher and after earnest study, has broken both with her religion and with all belief in a God, and thereby has not only earned the reputation of a heretic among the people, but has lost the lover of her youth, who has returned after a long absence, and, recoiling from the atheist, gives his heart to her younger and orthodox sister. Convinced that she is right, the heroine defies the deluded people and her once-loved sister, forces her faithless lover to follow her to the altar, and, breaking down at the threshold of the village church, declares before the excited multitude her disbelief in the Church's creed. She is besieged in her castle, and after she has, of her own free will, given up her lover and united him with her sister, she dies in the moment of deliverance under the knife of a fanatic Puritan, who regards the murder of the heretic as a duty pleasing to God. With great tact the author has fixed the date of his play for the time of the conclusion of the Treaty of Westphalia, and placed the scene on the borders of enlightened Holland, where Lutheran Frisians and Munster Catholics come in collision. Consequently he can account naturally for the influence of the Spinozistic philosopher, who has fled here from Amsterdam, as well as for the common hostility of the Lutheran and Catholic peasantry—who are led by a zealous schoolmaster and an unfrocked Jesuit father, and in spite of differences of creed believe in one God—towards their foe, the heretic who abjures a God. The energy with which the poet has depicted the wild Frisian nature breaking out in his heroine when she perceives her sister's love for the bridegroom who has just been restored to her, and has made her, instead of spending herself sentimentally in weak emotion, stand upon her own good right with unshaken firmness, shows dramatic power. The organic construction of the action of the play, the generally effective closes of the acts, the picturesque setting of the drama, and especially the scenes before the church and in the burning castle, show a theatrical knowledge rare among German playwrights. Originality of idea, forcible and concise dialogue, and bold and sharply defined characterization, even in the subordinate parts, assure to the writer his place among living dramatists next to Ferdinand von Saar, the creator of the powerful figures of the Emperor Henry V. and of Pope Gregory VII. (in his double tragedy 'Heinrich IV.'), and Heinrich Kruse, the author of the 'Gräfin,' 'Brutus,' 'Moritz von Sachsen,' 'Rosamunde,' 'König Erich von Schweden,' and the tragedy brought out this year, 'Der Verbannte,' who in their turn do not disown their indebtedness on the one side to H. v. Kleist, on the other to the "kraftgenialen" dramatists (Grabbe, Hebbel, &c.). In the latter there is this peculiarity: that the action, which, according to the father of the laws of poetry, is the first requisite in a drama, "its soul," is with them the second, and that the delineation of character, which, according to Aristotle, is the second requisite, is with them the first. The action, which, according to Aristotle, not only may be more philosophical than the history itself, but ought to be more so, is copied from the history as faithfully as possible, and the delineation of the characters is worked out upon the leading outlines with minute care; on the other hand, the organic construction and the limits of dramatic propriety are not unfrequently disregarded. But neither here nor elsewhere has Kruse gone so far as the author of 'Rosamunde' is represented to have gone by the mistranslation of an expression in my last year's review of German literature. The passage ran: "The queen is made to surrender herself to a servant before the eyes of the spectators." Nothing of the kind occurs in the drama. The true sense was: "The queen made a servant believe that she has surrendered herself to him before spectators." Probably the predominance of the narrative vein which runs through the situations of Kruse's dramas, sharply chiselled as they are as pictures of character, may account for the fact that, with the exception of his 'Countess,' which has succeeded in getting a footing on the German stage, none of his other plays has found its way on to the boards; as a poet this is doing him great injustice. The same narrative vein is met with in his last work, which gives a representation of the history of the well-known Danish minister Count Korfits Ulfeld, and of his ambitious wife Leonora Christina, a princess of royal blood. The piece is drawn carefully from the life, according to the memoirs of the Countess Ulfeld, and is rich in admirable scenes and details of character. The dénouement is true to history; the banished man meets his death in a lonely skiff among the reeds of the Rhine; but such a solution is decidedly weak as the catastrophe of a tragedy. An earlier drama by the same author, 'König Erich,' depicted the tragic fate of the Swedish "peasant-king," the eldest son of Gustavus Vasa, who chose a girl of humble origin to share his throne, and who died in a state of madness, ruined by the hatred of his younger brothers and the jealousy of the aristocracy. This drama has this year found a pendant in a play of the same name by Josef Weilen, which by the side of Kruse's richly coloured picture of character has the appearance of a highly finished water-colour. In the "mad" but not ignoble king—who is as reckless in his love as in his hate, who prefers the Swedish peasant girl Karin to the maiden Queen of England, who raises his own hand against the rebellious aristocracy and strikes them down by a bloody command, who loses his reason at the sight of the blood which was thus unwisely but not undeservedly spilt, and who receives the poisoned cup from the hand of the very rebel brother whom he had generously pardoned—we have an eminently tragic character. His conduct on the throne and his sufferings in prison remind one somewhat of Shakspeare's Richard II. Kruse allows us to see Erich's bloody deeds without any disguise, but contrives to give them a softening counterpoise by describing the tenderness of his love and his generosity towards his brother. Weilen, on the other hand, endeavours to bring the king nearer to us as a human being by making him lose his reason before the end of the play, and thus causing his fall and murderous actions to ensue without his being actually burdened by the guilt of bloodshed. Weilen's Erich is more deeply affecting but also more feminine, Kruse's more tragic but manlier. In his description of the growth of Erich's madness and its sudden outburst Weilen has been highly successful. Adolf Wilbrandt, in his tragedy of 'Robert Kerr,' is not so successful in the motives he introduces to account for the gradual transition and sudden change from honest frankness and love of truth to falsehood, deceit, treachery, and assassination. The history of the favourite of James I. of England who was raised to the rank of Duke of Somerset, and who, at the instigation of his wife, causes his friend and benefactor Overbury to be cast into the Tower and treacherously murdered, has been made use of by the poet as a means of depicting the character of a thoroughly upright and truthful young man, who, through his love for his wife (a second Lady Macbeth), allows himself to be led into committing a most foul breach of friendship. The opening of the piece—the meeting between the young Scotchman and the truth-loving king in the temple of truth which the latter has built, and the courtship of Frances—is most graceful and captivating. The portrait of James is a cabinet picture; the sudden change in the hero remains a psychological enigma; and the attempt to reconcile us to the husband and wife, in the face of death, by their mutual love for each other, proves vain, owing to the moral disgust aroused in us by their cowardly as well as treacherous behaviour. Whereas in this tragedy the point turns upon a common species of crime, which ought rather to have been brought before a law court than before a theatrical public, in Ferdinand von Saar's 'Tempesta,' as in Lessing's 'Emilia Galotti,' the point turns upon a "shadow," a "nothing," which, through the jealousy of the husband or the over-sensitiveness of her conscience, takes the impress of tragic guilt. "Tempesta" is the name given to the Dutch painter of sea-pieces Molyns, to characterize his stormy disposition. Upon an unfounded suspicion that his wife has given ear to whisperings of love from his aristocratic friend and host, he falls into a state of frenzy and murders his innocent wife, to free her from temptation. As Emilia Galotti, who cannot answer for herself, beseeches her father to take her life, Giovanna prays her husband to send her to a distance. The finely conceived motive and the rhythmical prose, which at times has a true poetic ring in it, are a sort of reminiscence of Lessing; yet the meagre plot and the want of episodic actions and figures make the otherwise important work appear too much like a mere dramatic sketch. The latest dramatic work of Martin Greif, the eminent lyric poet, bears the stamp of being an historical piece written for some special occasion. Its title is 'Prinz Eugen,' and it depicts in glowing colours the triumph of that "Prince Eugene, the noble knight," who in the national ballad is celebrated as the conqueror of the Turks, over his detractors and enemies at the imperial court at Vienna. Another piece, called 'Das Dokument,' from the pen of the lyric poetess Wilhelmina, Countess Wickenburg-Almásy (whose husband, Albrecht, Count Wickenburg, has this year published a very successful translation of Tennyson's 'Harold' into German), has for its subject a romantic occurrence in the annals of the Byzantine Empire, which the author has handled in a very graceful manner. It relates the story of the love of the politic Empress Eudocia for her military commander Romanus, who was condemned to death as a rebel, but whom she raised from the prison to the throne as her husband. This last piece, like Saar's 'Tempesta,' has not yet been brought before the footlights. The ingenious writer of fairy tales, Von Pützlitz, has given us a reminiscence of the Iffland family in his 'Rolf Bernd'; the humorous satirist Paul Lindau a serious "tendency piece" in his 'Gräfin Lea,' a somewhat late variation of the well-nigh antiquated theme of métamorphose and Jewish emancipation; and A. L'Arronge, the genial-hearted Völkedichter, a sentimental comedy called 'Haus Lonei.' The first two have won a rather doubtful success, the last-mentioned approval somewhat undeserved. Hamerling's 'Lord Lucifer,' which is written in the form of a dialogue, and is called by the author a comedy, is garnished with wearisome philosophical problems and grotesque traits of character; the hero is a splenetic lord, and the plot is borrowed from a well-known occurrence in the life of the once famous lady painter Angelica Kauffmann.

The new novels present us with familiar names. The gates of Freytag's hall of

'Ancestors' have finally closed this year. Auerbach, Spielhagen, Ebers, and others have contented themselves with works of smaller size. Auerbach's 'Brigitta' is a simple but powerful delineation of peasant life in Swabia, in dealing with which his is a master hand. Spielhagen's 'Qui si sana' takes as its title the comforting words from an inscription over the door of an hospitable inn in the island of Capri, and is a love story that is tragic in its ending. The renowned Egyptologist has added another volume to his archaeological pictures from the country of the Pharaohs in a simple story, entitled 'Die Schwestern,' from the days of the first Ptolemy; in this novel the principal figures are two charming Greek sisters who serve in the temple of Serapis and a philosophical recluse. Ferdinand Meyer, the author of the historical novel 'Georg Jenatsch,' gives us in his last novel, 'Der Heilige,' the biography of the politic minister of Henry II. of England and the subsequent martyr of the Romish Church, Thomas à Becket. It is written in a simple, archaic style, with some romantic additions, and is narrated by an honest Swiss countryman, whose fate has cast him upon the shores of the British Isles, and who, as a skilful archer, is made one of the king's body-guard, and thus becomes mixed up with the tragic death of the Chancellor. Alexander Schindler, a romanticist of rather late date, whose mediæval tale, 'Schelm von Bergen,' enveloped in a "moon-illuminated, magic night," exhibited such sharp polemical features, has this year published a tale entitled 'Die Goldschmieds Kinder,' which is adorned with all the charms description can give of German and Italian middle-class life in the days of the Reformation and the Renaissance. Theodor Storm, the Meissener of the German style of novel-writing, has again, in his 'Söhne des Senators,' given us a cabinet picture of North Albingian middle-class life, attractive in the smallest of frames, owing to its accurate delineation of character and truth to nature. Of the latest style of French romance we have an echo in Rudolf Lindau's 'Aus der guten Gesellschaft,' which is marked by the photographic accuracy of its descriptions; also in Theodor Fontane's finely spun tale, 'L'Adultera,' descriptive of middle-class life in Berlin, in which he gives an undisguised psychological exposure of social aberrations. Heinrich Laube, a veteran in the field of literature, has once more ventured upon its slippery ground with a three-volume novel, 'Die Boekminger,' the hero of which is a descendant of the philosophical shoemaker Jacob Boehme of Gölitz, who as a student becomes involved in the raid against the demagogues in Germany in the third decade of the present century. Friedrich Uhl, who originally showed talent for describing scenery, but has in his latest works exhibited a decided turn for well-conceived artistico-historical narratives, has come forward with an historical novel, 'Die Botschafterin,' from the days of the last kings of Poland; Rudolf von Gottschall, the publicist and literary historian, with a social romance, 'Das Goldene Kalb,' the materials for which are taken from the latest exhibitions of the financial fever. Wilbrandt also, the productive dramatist, and Franzos, the drastic delineator of semi-Asiatic peasant life, have both contributed to this year's literature, the former issuing a good-natured romance depicting artist life, called 'Meister Amor,' and the latter a Polish pendant to H. von Kleist's classic novel 'Michael Kohlhaas,' the title of which is 'Ein Kampf um's Recht,' and, like the first mentioned, gives the story of an honest fanatic who is driven to help himself by crime when justice is denied him. Among the writers of smaller novels during the past year I may here mention the clever novelist Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach, who has likewise published some hundred 'Aphorismen,' which in part are finely drawn; her 'Lotti die Uhrmacherin' is a carefully finished delineation of character, which appeared in that excellent periodical Die Deutsche Rundschau; also Paul Heyse's profound and pessimistic idyl 'Die Keelin,' which appeared in Lindau's journal Nord und Süd. These two works are both gems of their different kinds.

In the same way as a romance resembles real life, many a life resembles a romance. An inferior actor in a suburban Berlin theatre did not receive at his cradle the promise that he would one day become the intimate friend of a king and the military confidant of the greatest drill-sergeant of his day, the Czar Nicholas. "Hofrath" Louis Schneider's autobiography (in which, in his vanity, he throws as much light upon himself as possible) is worth reading as a contribution to the history of his day and of life at the Prussian and Russian courts. The author, a born courtier and flatterer, was reader to King Frederic William IV., and a favourite of the Czar, who invited him to his manoeuvres in order to have his (the civilian's) opinion respecting the demeanour and uniforms of his troops, and also induced him, who was more Russian in his feelings than a born Russian, to supply confidential reports about the Prussian court and state, and about his royal brother-in-law, "the poet." What a contrast between the merry-maker who stoops voluntarily to become an informant, and the inspired artistic spirit whose political enthusiasm drew him away from the thoughtful peacefulness of his studio, and led him to become the head of the provisional government of his native Saxony during the insurrection of May, 1849, in Dresden! The architect of the Dresden Theatre and of the Zurich Polytechnicum, the reviver of the antique polychromy, and the author of the classic work on 'Style'—the late Gottfried Semper—has found a loving biographer in his son, Hans Semper; but the many-sidedness of the father's extraordinary nature has not been by any means exhausted by him. Besides this work, we have the biographies of the Swiss poet Albrecht von Haller, by Adolf Frey; that of the Chancellor von Wachter, the celebrated professor of law, by his equally famous pupil, Prof. Bernhard Windscheid; and that of Benedikt Waldeck, the German politician and leader of the Liberal party in the Prussian Parliament, from the pen of his no less well-known political friend H. B. Oppenheim. The well-nigh forgotten author of the didactic poem 'Die Alpen' (Von Haller) has had the honour done him of being, as a didactic poet, called Schiller's prototype, in whose poems we may find numerous echoes of his predecessor, who had himself studied medicine. Further, a new biography of Goethe, by the industrious H. Duentzer, and a pamphlet by Bielschowsky, on Friederike Brion of Seesenheim, have also come to light, without exactly bringing much light with them. On the other hand, in Pirazzi's 'Aus Offenbach's Vergangenheit,' and in L. Geiger's 'Goethe-Jahrbuch,' as well as in the correspondence of the La Roche family, there have appeared recently some hitherto unknown letters of the poet and of his mother, the "Frau Rath," to the family André and their relative, Rahel d'Orville. In the above-mentioned 'Jahrbuch' the life of the "child" Bettina v. Arnim has been lovingly portrayed by her son-in-law, Hermann Grimm, and the able literary historian, Wilhelm Scherer, has presented new points of view respecting unfinished and enigmatical poems of the great master, e.g., 'Pandora' and 'Satyros.' From the pen of the last-named ingenious literary historian there is also appearing (in parts) a 'Deutsche Literaturgeschichte,' which is almost the only learned book on this subject that is free from the pedantic dust of the school-room, and, in spite of many bold and venturesome assertions, develops a clear and unprejudiced picture of the beginnings of German literature. As Scherer himself belongs to the school of the fathers of German literary history—the brothers Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm—we have in Otto Brahm, the author of some interesting studies on German plays of chivalry (an outcome of Goethe's 'Götz von Berlichingen'), a disciple of Scherer's school. A pleasing and characteristic picture of the above-named two brothers has been revived in the publication by Wendeler of a long series of their letters to Von Meusebach, the eccentric but learned bibliophil and collector of books, a figure à la Hoffmann. The latter has awakened from a well-deserved literary death-sleep a spur-clattering dramatist belonging to the days of Götz, Count Töring Seefeld. The reviving fondness for the artistic and literary productions of bygone times has called forth a flood of works upon the one still existing remnant of the mediæval style of drama, the Oberammergau Passion Play, among others those of Ed. Devrient and Aug. Hartmann. There has also been published the earliest existing text of the Passion Play, from an Augsburg MS. of the year 1662 from the monastery of SS. Afra and Ulrich. The history of art always goes hand in hand with the history of literature. In addition to the comprehensive works of Jac. von Falke, 'Costumengeschichte der Culturvölker,' and Starke, 'Systematik und Geschichte der Archæologie der Kunst,' as also the artistico-historical publications of numerous societies of art and archæology, we have treatises of smaller size, but valuable in substance, such as Ernst Förster's praiseworthy 'Farnesina Studien,' Lermolief's (a nom de plume of Morelli, the Senator of the Italian kingdom) 'Werke Italienischer Meister in den Gallerien von Dresden, Berlin, und München,' and likewise the small but excellent 'Katechismus der Kunstgeschichte,' by Bruno Bucher. The comprehensive collective work 'Kunst und Künstler,' by R. Dohme—a richly illustrated collection of, in part, most carefully written biographies of artists, among which A. Springer's 'Rafael und Michelangelo' must rank first—is about coming to an end. Ernst Guhl's praiseworthy collection of 'Künstlerbriefe' has been enriched by a new volume. Alfred von Wurzbach, editor of the 'Goldene Bibel,' a splendid edition of the New Testament which is richly adorned with pictures by the most eminent artists of every age and school, without this being exactly an advantage to the internal harmony of the book, has translated Houbraeken's 'Schowburg,' the Dutch Vasari, into German, and added a critical commentary to it. The study of the history of art has been on the increase in Germany during the last few years, and has been greatly encouraged by the Austrian Museum for Art and Industry in Vienna (in imitation of the South Kensington Museum in London), most admirably managed by Eitelberger, Falke, Bucher, and others. These artistic and scientific efforts have for more than sixteen years had a centre for discussion in Lützow's illustrated Zeitschrift für bildende Kunst, which periodical has for some time past been followed by Janitschek's Repertorium für Kunstgeschichte. Alfred Woltmann, one of the most active champions of the Kunstwissenschaft, which has only during the last few decades taken root in Germany, died before his time last year.

To the large publications connected with the excavations that have been carried on by Conze and others, at the expense of the Austrian Government, in the island of Samothrace, where considerable remains of foundations of the temples of the ancient Cabiri have been brought to light, another volume was added this year, which is the last of the series. Respecting the much more important discoveries in Olympia and Pergamus, which the German Government have been making, the public have as yet received only preliminary reports. The "Trojan War" which for more than ten years has been carried on between Schliemann, the digger of the treasures of Priam, and the professors of Greek in Germany, has through Schliemann's last work, 'Ilios,' now taken a turn which may lead to peace. Schliemann, who has on his side eminent men such as Virchow and others, still maintains that he has in the hill of Hissarlik, ten mètres below the surface, found a burned city with a gateway towards the west as well as a treasure of gold; but he no longer declares this town to be Troy, the gate to be the Scæan Gate, or the treasure that of the king "skilled in hurling the lance." Glaucus has exchanged his golden armour for brazen mail.

The love of wandering shown by the old Teutons is still displayed in their descendants. The Romereise of the German emperors have nowadays assumed the form of a Culturkampf; but the journeys to Rome of German artists, patrons of art, and poets have not ceased with Carstens, Winkelmann, and Goethe. Wilh. Rossmann's letters from Southern Italy prove that even after Gregorovius and Stahr one may give an account of unseen things on "the shores of the Cyclops and Sirens." Another book by the same author, called "gastfahrten" to Rome and the monasteries of Mount Athos, which is devoted more to religious than to artistic objects, shows that as a Protestant "visitor" one acquires a sharp eye for the peculiarities of the Catholic and Orthodox Greek Churches. The "old diplomatist" who has published the impressions of his travels in Persia and Turkey under the phil-Hellenic name of "Charikles" was evidently enticed to the East by the "black spot" of the Eastern Question. The danger that within a short time the mysterious people of the future who herd around the Kremlin, with its hundred towers, might establish their sovereignty upon the ruins of that faith which built the Alhambra, may have induced the thoughtful and intellectual traveller Max Nordau to write his instructive and graphic account of travel, 'Vom Kreml zur Alhambra'; Pigge's book carries the reader to Africa; Lauth, the learned and caustic Egyptologist, perhaps intends his 'Bilder aus Aegyptens Vorzeit' to be a supplement to G. Ebers's splendid but almost too poetic work, 'Aegypten'; this latter, again, has its pendant in Emil Schlagintweit's 'Indien in Wort und Bild'; the author is a member of the celebrated family of Asiatic travellers. A book that marks an epoch, by another member of this family, 'Reisen in Indien und Hochasien,' by Hermann v. Schlagintweit, has just been brought to a close by a fourth volume. The highland of Europe, Tyrol, the stronghold of faith—which by the number of its monasteries and the piety of its inhabitants reminds one of Tibet—has found unholy, but all the more active, patrons in the good-natured satirist L. Stenb, who writes 'Aus Tyrol,' and also in J. F. Lentner, with his 'Aus Tyrol und Oberbayern'; the last-mentioned author has again appeared before the public after having for long been undeservedly forgotten.

History belongs to geography as time to space. An epoch-making work worthy to take its place by the side of those of Ranke, Mommsen, Sybel, Droysen, &c., has not appeared this year, although the historical libraries, such as the 'Geschichte in Einzeldarstellungen' of Oncken, and the quondam Heeren-Ukert series of histories of individual kingdoms and countries, have been actively carried on. Historical monographs and memoirs therefore come to the front. Notable among the first class are a tasteful lecture of Felix Dahn on 'Die Alemannenschlacht bei Strassburg'; a tractate on Herzog Albrecht von Brandenburg-Preussen and his court preacher Funke, known by his tragic end under the charge of treason, by U. Albert Hase, a son of the Church historian of that name, who was styled the Lutheran Pope; and an account, derived from the State archives of Berlin and Vienna, of the relations between Austria and Prussia before and after the accession of Joseph II., by G. Wolf. The last-named brochure is a sign of the historical interest which the centenary of Joseph's accession excited in that ruler's life. The second half of the eighteenth century saw Plato's wish fulfilled—to be sure, not in the sense that, as he desired, the philosophers became rulers, but in that that the rulers, male and female, were philosophers. Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and the Emperor Joseph formed a philosophical triad. Of these enlightened despots, all German born, Frederick was the sharpest, Catherine the most spirituelle, and Joseph undoubtedly the noblest. His despotism, as An. Grün has said of him, was like that of the day, whose sun will not endure night and mist near it. Every step he took as ruler of his dominions was an advance against inherited circumstances and ills, although, as his keen-sighted rival Frederick remarked, he often took the second step before the first, and therefore, towards the close of his unfortunately short life, he was forced to retrace many steps. The ruler who first granted toleration in his Catholic states to Protestants and Jews, dissolved countless monasteries, and resisted the pretensions of the Papacy, whose memory is consequently considered accursed by the Ultramontanes, has shared the lot of the saints. Round his person a cycle of legends has formed among the people. The Bohemian peasants, whom he had freed from serfdom, would not, years after his decease, believe that he was dead; they thought that his and their foes hold him prisoner somewhere. The consequence is that he has found only enemies or blind admirers. A history of Joseph, such as Arneth has written of Maria Theresa, has yet to be composed. Collections of materials and anecdotes, such as those of Hermann, Wendrinski, &c., in spite of the abundance of their contents, do not deserve the name of histories—a title which, on the other hand, is fully merited by the thoroughgoing and tasteful 'Culturbilder aus Oesterreich,' written by Adam Wolf on the model of the classical German 'Culturbilder' of G. Freytag, and also by the similar 'Culturbilder aus Bohmen' of J. Svatk. An interesting picture of civilization is given by Adolf Streckfuss in his 'Funfhundert Jahre Berliner Geschichte,' which traces the development of the "Metropolis of Intelligence" from the fishing hamlet of Altköln on the Spree—where even towards the end of the seventeenth century the courtiers at the court of the Great Elector went to his highness's palace on stilts, on account of the mire—to the cosmopolitan capital of the empire, where, instead of junkers of the Mark, crowned heads and dukes flock to the emperor's court.

The brilliant period of the new era has also found its critics. Herr v. Treitschke will not be the only person to call Bruno Bauer's 'Zur Orientierung über die Bismarck'sche Aera' a bitter, bad pamphlet. The solitary adherent of the Hegelian State absolutism, which paved the way for the Caesarism of to-day, subjects the latter and its foremost champion to a criticism the pitiless tone of which might be envied by the apostles of "la revanche" on the other side of the Rhine. The Napoleonic Imperium and the new German Empire are to him the beginning of secular, as the Vatican Council is the beginning of spiritual, Caesarism. The foreign policy of the Chancellor, vis-à-vis Napoleon III. and Gortschakoff, appears to him a second edition of the policy of Frederick William II. of Prussia in relation to the French Republic and the partition of Poland. The internal policy of Bismarck seems to him to consist in leading the domestic parties against one another, and, when they have served his purpose, reducing them to a passive condition. People and popular representation worn out, the power of initiative of the whole nation in all branches of industrial industry, science, and art, and that of the Parliament in legislation, hampered, the master himself sinks into ever-increasing irritability, ill temper, debility! This and other lectures will, however, hardly deprive the "Enchanter of Varzin" of the enjoyment of his afternoon pipe.

Absolutism in philosophy, as Bruno Bauer's example proves, has been followed by Nihilism in criticism; the return to Kant, which has of late been the principal feature of German philosophy, has had for consequence a new critique of human cognition. While English philosophy, under the influence of Comte, strives to extend itself into an encyclopædia of all human knowledge, German philosophy, as a general rule, places itself at the point where English stood about Locke's time. Positivists like Dühring, mystics like Hartmann, and "criticists" of the school of Lange, the author of the 'History of Materialism,' like Liebmann, Vaihinger, and others, strive with one another for the mastery among the publications of the year. Gustav Biedermann's three volumes on the 'Philosophie als Begriffswissenschaft' stand out as an anachronism in their endeavour to construct, after the example of Hegel, the whole sum of human knowledge on the plan of a trichotomic system of self-division. The author who first became known by an exposition of the philosophical ideas contained in Humboldt's 'Cosmos' makes the concept of life the foundation of his philosophy, and nature and spirit are designated by him its equally legitimate modes of being and phenomenon. The knowledge of these two makes the science of nature and spirit; the knowledge of life, on the contrary, the wisdom of life, in which three divisions the content of philosophy exhausts itself, according to this author. Here is a complete system. The 'Logik' of Lotze, certainly the most distinguished of the German philosophers of the present day, which has just reached a second edition, is the first part of a system of which the 'Metaphysik,' which was published last year, forms the completion, and, like the deservedly esteemed 'Mikrokosmos' of the same author, its bases approach the 'Monadology' of Leibnitz. Eduard v. Hartmann, in his much-discussed tractate upon 'Die Selbstsetzung des Christenthums,' furnishes proof of the crisis in which Christianity is involved by a caustic critique of the latest orthodox and mediating theology, which, like the expositions of dogma by Pfleiderer and Lipsius, stands on the shoulders of Schleiermacher. Hartmann's opponent, Julius Bahnen—whose philosophy, like that of the Unconscious, rests on the principles of Schopenhauer, but defines the "Ding an sich" of Schopenhauer, the Will, pluralistically, and not, as Hartmann does, monistically—has in his 'Real-dialektik' expounded an original spiritual paradoxical system, according to which the Tragic is the law of the world, and, in opposition to Hegel's logical optimism, the anti-logical only really exists. A 'Geschichte der Psychologie,' by H. Siebeck; the second volume of Windelband's 'Geschichte der Philosophie'; and a second edition, enlarged to twice the original size, of Thilo's short 'Geschichte der Philosophie,' have appeared. R. Eucken has made a successful attempt in his 'Festschrift,' 'Ueber Bilder und Gleichnisse in der Philosophie,' to justify the devil's sarcastic remark that where thoughts fail words take their place.

Not less than five collections of popular scientific lectures appear in Germany. Notabilities like Helmholtz, Zeller, and others do not think it beneath their dignity to deliver popular lectures. An organization extending over all Germany has set on foot public lectures in all the larger German towns—a proof that among the nation of thinkers, even in the new era, and not in Goethe's days merely, "every one reads" and almost every one writes, and also every one is willing to listen and almost every one to teach.

ROBERT ZIMMERMANN.

HOLLAND.

If I were to choose a motto, it would be "The air is full of farewells for the dying." I do not remember a year in which so many of our literary men have been taken from us as in the twelve months which have elapsed since my last review.

I ought to have recorded last year the death of Van Zeggelen, a popular writer of comic verses, who sacrificed real talents to the applause of a certain class of readers, asking before all things to be amused. His talent lay another way. The serious poems he wrote prove him to have been a serious man at bottom, who discovered in an evil hour that he could easily write comic verse and gain popularity by it. It is impossible not to regret that he had not strength enough to resist the temptation. Another very popular author, Cremer, has died in the course of 1880. His popularity is well deserved. Like Dickens, whom he resembled in more points than one, he tried in most of his books to remedy some social evil, or, if that were beyond his power, he strove to open the eyes of the public to the "something rotten" in society or the State. It was he who gave the first impulse, by his 'Fabriekskinderen,' to the passing of the law which limits children's labour. In 'Anna Rooze' he exposed the injustice of the system of subjecting supposed criminals to imprisonment for months sometimes before their trial. The tendency of his books is laudable, but, considered as works of art, his larger works are all but failures. His real masterpieces are his village tales, most of which are written in the Guelder dialect, which gave them a peculiar charm when read by himself, or rather half acted, in a way which also savoured of Dickens. 'Monte Carlo,' a short sketch of life at Monaco, contains the simple story of two people brought to the brink of ruin by the husband's gambling, but saved in time by his repentance. This little tale has been published since Cremer's death, and is considered as a keepsake by the many friends who loved him for his amiable character even more than they admired him for his talents. In this year died also Dr. Wapp, who has made himself known by his 'Reis naar Rome' ('Journey to Rome'), by his translations of Lamartine, and by what he wrote about the life and manners of Bilderdyk, our master poet of this age, whom he knew and honoured from his youth. In Dr. Eelco Verwys and Mr. P. Leendertz Wz. we lose two untiring workers in the field of our ancient literature and philology. The former published the 'Wapen Martyna,' the masterpieces of Maerlant, the father of our didactic school in the thirteenth century; and to Mr. Leendertz is due the publication of 'Der Minnen

Loep' ('The Course of True Love'), the works of Van Hildegabersberch, and, best of all, a chronological edition of the poems of Hooft (1561-1647), the writer of the sweetest and most exquisite love songs in the language. In March of this year died Mr. de Jonge, who has written 'De Opkomst van het Ned. Gezag in O. Indië' ('The Rise of the Authority of the Dutch in the East Indies'), a book full of information. He left it unfinished, but it will be continued by Mr. Robidé van der Aa. The last thing De Jonge penned was a good essay on Louise de Coligny. To him we owe also the reorganization of the museum in the Mauritshuis, at the Hague. A few weeks ago we lost in Dr. B. ter Haar a man to whom Holland is under great obligations. He compiled a popular history of the Church, but as a poet he ranked among the best of his contemporaries. There have been many among the living and the dead more fertile and more versatile than he, but you have only to open any of his books to feel he was a poet. Among his best pieces were 'Joannes en Theogenes,' the 'St. Paul's Rock,' the verses on Elvire's birthday, and that little gem, 'Huibert en Klaartje.'

But though we regret the friends we have just lost, we do not forget the illustrious dead of former centuries. There has been a Bellamy exhibition this year; the five hundredth anniversary of Thomas à Kempis's birth was kept in August; next year we shall celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of Hooft's birth; and thanks to the untiring efforts of Van Vloten, Elizabeth Wolff will have her monument. In an essay bearing her name he has paid a just tribute to her memory. This notable woman lived and wrote in the last century and the first years of ours. In her youth, and during her married life, she wrote much prose and poetry by herself, and in after years with her friend Agatha Deken. They wrote novels in the form of Richardson's, but so truly original, so full of genuine feeling and common sense, in such graphic and idiomatic Dutch, that we must consider it a good omen that their books find more readers every day. But one greater than any of these has had a tribute paid to his memory this year: Spinoza's statue has been erected in the Hague. The ceremony of the uncovering of the beautiful statue, executed by a young French artist, Frédéric Hoxamer, was simple, as befitted a man who was simple and unassuming in all things. In a beautiful speech Van Vloten sketched him as the master mind who taught that philosophy ought to be speculation on life, not on death, and as preparing the coming of age of mankind ("Spinoza, de blyde boodschapper der mondige menschheid"). The Spectator dedicated an entire number to the ceremony and to Spinoza.

Geddes's book on Johan de Witt has been translated by Mr. van Deventer, who has enhanced the value of the book for us by adding the accounts of the States-General and the States of Holland as they are to be found in the registers. Dr. van Vloten has published the second volume of 'Het Nederlandsch Kluchtspel' ('Dutch Farces'), and a long-looked-for edition of Maerlant's 'Merlin,' after the single manuscript that is known to exist. Mr. Kolléwyn has written in German a dissertation on the influence of our Dutch dramatists on Gryphius and the Germans. Dr. Burgerdyk, of whose translation of Shakspeare's sonnets I spoke last year, published in the Gids of August a fine translation of 'Prometheus' in Æschylus's own metres, so far as they could be imitated in a modern language. Mr. Voormaa's translation of the 'Iliad,' which I mentioned the year before last, is finished now.

Of original poetry of a superior kind there is none. A nice little volume of Honigh's poems and another of Miss Stratenus—that is all. Some of Mr. Honigh's songs are full of true feeling, and to my mind far superior to his translation of the legend of Beatrijs. Beets is all but silent. I do not think he has written anything this year except a sweet little poem on the birth of our princess royal; the same event has called forth a strange production by Mr. Brouwers. By the christening of the young princess, whom he supposes to have been baptized with water from the sacred river Jordan, he is reminded of John the Baptist, who used that water to baptize his disciples. Vondel wrote an epic poem on John the Baptist more than 200 years ago; and now Mr. Brouwers dramatizes that epic, inserts a great number of the elder poet's lines, connects the different scenes with some very good verses of his own, and dedicates the tragedy to the young princess and her guardian angel. This association of ideas, which to Mr. Brouwers appears quite natural, seems to me rather far-fetched.

Of one of his own stirring novels Schimmel has made a drama, 'De Kat van den Tower' ('The Cat of the Tower'), and Mulder has changed his amusing little story, 'Uit den tyd, dat ik nog een lief vera maakte' ('From the Days I used to make Charming Poems'), into a rather mediocre play, inferior to his political comedy 'De Kiesvereeninging te Stellendyk' ('The Political Club at Stellendyk'). Brunijs, who writes such amusing books, choosing sailors and soldiers for his chief characters, has published a novel, 'Alice,' in which the improbabilities of Alice's circumstances and fate are redeemed by the noble characters of the captain and his mate. Mrs. van Westreene has surpassed herself in 'Philip's Eerzucht' ('Philip's Ambition'). In itself it is a phenomenon that a lady who has for years enjoyed a reputation as a translator of good novels should successfully enter the lists as a novel-writer, at a time when nobody expected anything of the kind. The lady who uses the pseudonym of Van Walcheren, and who is known as the author of 'Penserosa,' has written a nice book this year, 'Zyne Zuster' ('His Sister'), in which the plot is weak, but the characters well drawn, especially that of the sister. Dr. ten Brink's 'De Familie Muller-Belmonte,' too, is distinguished by good character painting. Jan Holland in 'Koningsdroom' ('A King's Dream') gives us in his own sarcastic style a long-drawn bouade on some old and some very modern abuses of our social system. Our great novelist, Mrs. Boesboom Toussaint, has surprised us with a novel, 'Raimond de Schrypwerker' ('The Joiner'), which proves again that her mind is as young as ever and her vigour undiminished.

At the end of last month there appeared a novel from Mr. Voamaer. His name is well known to foreign readers by his study on Rembrandt. The novel is called 'Amazon,' and is written in his fluent, graceful style. The heroine is called so because, having suffered all the miseries of an ill-assorted marriage, she has resolved, after her husband's death, to tear all tender feeling from her heart, and never to love or to yield to a man's love again. Though a perfect woman, nobly planned, and full of high feelings, I think she is not heroic enough for an Amazon, and yields pretty soon. The man who wins her love is a painter, who reminds me every now and then of a great artist living in England, but of Dutch birth. The characters of the old gentleman always studying and quoting Ovid and the poor cripple Salviati are very amiable and attractive; but the greatest charms of the book are its style, the interesting conversations on sculpture, painting, and poetry, and the Italian atmosphere that seems to pervade all its descriptions of scenery, and which gives an air of reality to the whole book.

Though there is something indescribably sad in the thought that there are so many from whose fingers the pen has dropped for good, there is consolation in the belief that others will rise in their places.

E. VAN CAMPEN.

HUNGARY.

THE comparison is prosaic, still it is true that the literature of 1880 has, like the harvest, been a middling crop, inferior not only in quantity but also in quality to that of 1879. Perhaps the most striking thing I have to mention is a splendid translation into Hungarian of the comedies of Aristophanes by our greatest living poet, J. Arany, to whom we also owe a version of the tragedies of Sophocles. In neither has the form nor the matter of the Greek poet suffered, for all the beauties and attraction of the original have been faithfully preserved in the translation. Next to Arany I may mention M. Jókai, the untiring and still brilliant novelist, who is no stranger to the novel-reading public in England, and whose last work, 'Aazonyt kiser, istent kiser,' gives a good picture of the Nihilist movements in Hungary. It is, however, a great pity that M. Jókai should busy himself with politics, for in consequence he does not always bestow upon his writings the necessary care and finish. If politics are a hindrance to M. Jókai, so is the official life to M. Charles Szász, who has produced only a few trifles, unless I except a well-written notice of the late Mr. G. H. Lewes, in which that English man of letters, who was a member of our Academy, is spoken of with the respect due to the rare qualities which distinguished the biographer of Goethe. A writer belonging to the younger generation, M. Gregory Csiky, has been much talked of in consequence of two comedies he has published this year, of which one is called 'A Proletárok' ('The Proletarians'), and the other 'Mukanyi.' In both the abuses and faults of Hungarian social life are ridiculed in a most merciless way, but, I must add, at the same time with a cleverness that justifies the applause which the plays have earned. Among dramatic compositions I may mention further 'Rolandné'

('Madame Roland'), a tragedy by M. G. Szász, in which the author has given ample proof of his power of character painting and of sublimity of diction. Amongst the novels of the current year, 'Edmund Párbaja' ('Edmund's Duel'), by Cornel Abrányi, has been much talked about, and it is indeed a well-told story, containing many careful descriptions of character. A similar judgment may be passed on E. Kazár's 'A Semmi ha valamivé lesz' ('The Nobody if he becomes a Somebody'), and on A. Balázs's 'Tarka Képek' ('Motley Pictures'). The last-named author excels in short humorous sketches, but his longer tales generally lack smoothness.

The writing of memoirs is decidedly on the increase. Mr. Pulasky, who occupies the foremost place in this branch of letters, has this year published the second volume of his 'Életem és Korom' ('My Life and my Age'), and it is superfluous to remark that his sparkling style, his lively and sometimes humorous manner of relating the stirring episodes of a life rich in incident, and the highly interesting topics he treats—the present volume contains the story of our war of independence in 1848—are fitted to give to our reading public a high notion of the literature of memoirs, so much cultivated in your country. Speaking of England, I cannot omit to mention that the part of Mr. Pulasky's book relating to London, where he was sent as a representative of Hungary by M. Kossuth, fully deserves to be translated into English, as it would highly interest the British public to know something about the relations between the Hungarian revolution and the late Lord Palmerston. Memoirs have also been published by M. Frankenburg, which deal mainly with Hungarian literary matters, and by Count Alexander Teleky, a man well known in England, who gives the contents of his diary in a kaleidoscopic form, without any affectation of literary skill. Still, his book is attractive. It is much like the account a private soldier gives of the exploits of his regiment.

A word will suffice for our poetry. Messrs. J. Lóvay and John Vajda have both published collections of their verse. M. Vajda particularly deserves attention. He is a most original man, he has a great command of passion, his imagination is powerful, and his language of a truly classic type.

My remarks on belles-lettres will apply also to the historical publications of the past year. The most important book is M. Kossuth's 'Irataim az Emigrációból' ('Memories of my Exile'), the style and contents of which the English public knows by this time through the English translation. The work has naturally created a great sensation in Hungary, where the author still enjoys the unbounded veneration of his countrymen.

Among strictly scientific publications the foremost place must be allotted to M. F. Pesty's 'Az eltűnt Régi Varmegyék' ('The old Vanished Counties'), a work based upon long study and profound investigations. From it we learn that Hungary, now divided into fifty-two counties, consisted formerly of seventy-two. This change in the political divisions of the country could be only traced after an assiduous scrutiny among the archives, and careful criticism of data was imperatively needed. A similar spirit prevails in Prof. Wenzel's 'Magyarország Bányászati és Kertészeti Története' ('Critical History of Mining in Hungary'), the learned professor being also the best expounder of the mining law of Hungary, and in Dr. T. Pauler's 'History of the Buda-Pesth University,' which was published on the occasion of the centenary celebrated this year. M. Thaly, the historiographer of the Rákoczy period, has published a thick volume on the life and deeds of Ladislaus Ocskay, who may be called a simple condottiere, and of whom very little was known even in his own country. It may be said that this restless spirit was not worth the pains taken by his biographer; but if Motley deemed it worth while publishing two big volumes upon the history of the United Netherlands from the death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort, why should we not write about Ocskay? These are the chief historical publications of the year, but, in order to make the list as complete as possible, I must add Prof. R. Torma's 'Repertorium ad Literaturam Decis Archaeologicam et Epigraphicam,' one of the greatest and most valuable collections of material with which our literature has been enriched in 1880. Besides, allow me to say that, owing to the exertions of Prof. Torma, the ruins of a Roman amphitheatre have been discovered in the precincts of the old Aquincum. The excavations are proving fruitful, and will certainly attract the attention of archaeologists.

Of course there have been sundry minor publications and detached papers relating to history; I may further add that the history of art is beginning to give signs of life under the auspices of the learned Prof. Henszelmann. M. V. Myskovsky's 'Medieval Artistic Monuments of Bártfa' is worth mentioning, and so are some contributions by M. Charles Pulasky, the son of the autobiographer. Here, as in many other branches of our national culture, we are still collecting material and preparing for work; but there are unmistakable signs of progress in every department of science, and this could hardly be said fifteen years ago. The Hungarian Natural Philosophical Society is particularly flourishing, and the number of its regular subscribing members amounts to 4,000. The object of the said society, to diffuse a knowledge of science, is attained by the publication partly of original books and partly of translations of important French, English, and German works. Geographical discoveries have also begun quite recently to interest Hungarian men of science, and the travels of Count B. Széchenyi to the Kuku-Nor and Eastern Thibet, although he failed to reach Lhasa, will undoubtedly throw new light upon those little-known parts of Asia. In particular the geological investigations, which were entrusted to M. Lóczy, promise to fill up a gap.

Last but not least come the works of our philologists, who—partly busy in investigating the ancient grammatical forms of the Magyar tongue, partly also in the comparative study of the related Finn-Ugrian languages—have shown some signs of activity. Prof. Budenz has brought to a conclusion the 'Comparative Dictionary' of which I spoke in my previous reports, and I hope to review it in the columns of this paper. M. Szilády has published 'Pelsőrt Élete és Munkái ('The Life and Works of Pelbart'), a book in which the place of Pelbartus de Temesvár, a famous schoolman and author of the 'Catharine Legend in the Literature of the World,' is discussed with learning and critical judgment. Of a particular value is Prof. Simonyi's treatise 'A Magyar Költészek,' to which the Academy has deservedly awarded a prize.

There may have been some contributions to the various branches of literature which have escaped my attention, but the omissions can scarcely be of great importance, and I may conclude with my introductory remark, that taken altogether the annual literary harvest must be called meagre.

H. VAMDEY.

ITALY.

In Italy twenty years ago we had several celebrated authors, though there was then no general Italian literary movement. Now we hear complaints respecting a dearth of such classic books as then made our land famous. The fact is we are now harder to please, and much less given to admiring. The number of workers is ten times as great as it used to be. Owing to competition, we have every day in the market what used to appear once a year as a great event. I have been myself astonished on finishing my 'Dizionario degli Scrittori Contemporanei,' to find that the Italian writers of whom I could obtain notices amounted by themselves to almost two thousand, and I am persuaded that another thousand about whom I could not procure information deserved to be included in such a dictionary. An army of three thousand writers, most of them busy, in a country which is just reviving, seems to me a considerable fact. I know that there are critics in England disposed to blame us for excessive complaisance towards ourselves; they think that ours is a fault common to the Latin races, and deem it a proof of childishness and inferiority. But there is no disputing facts, and they seem to me to tell in favour of our country. Naturally three thousand make a crowd, and in a crowd it is hard to excite attention and not to be confounded with it. This is the reason why many books are now overlooked that forty years ago would have made a sensation in Italy.

In regno cecorum monoculus est rex.

Now we all have our eyes open, and we are all able to discover our imperfections. The most formidable criticism always comes from colleagues and pupils; the number of colleagues and pupils has increased enormously; books are perhaps selling more largely in Italy, but they are less hired, and, above all, people are less in a hurry to crown the writers with an undying laurel wreath. There is less polish of style, but more natural writing; there is perhaps less imagination, but there is more good sense, much more critical judgment. What Italy seems to have lost in talent she has certainly gained in knowledge. We have, perhaps, less originality than formerly, but we are more like other men who pass for being highly civilized. Perhaps at starting there has been some feeling of the way. Some fancied they could be independent of foreigners and thought only of traditions of the past; others were seized with a rage for imitating strangers and wished to become learned in the German fashion in a single day; others wandered in empty space. Now the excessive imitation of the Germans is at an end, and in proportion as they feel their strength, Italians assert their rights as a nation in art, science, in everything. This is excess in the other direction. Yet I have hopes that presently an equipoise may be established, and that the feeling for harmony characteristic of our race will find quite naturally a modus vivendi for Italian thought in face of the universal progress. While I am writing these lines I learn that a young Tuscan philosopher and man of letters, Prof. Giacomo Barzellotti, is about to deliver a lecture at the Circolo Filologico at Florence on the actual aptitude of Italian culture. It is a pity that all writing Young Italy cannot hear him. I know the ideas of Prof. Barzellotti on the subject, and I am persuaded that he will be listened to with profit. In any case, I mention his name because it may persuade those who like to rail at our chauvinism that in the home of the fine arts there are artists in criticism, and Signor Barzellotti is an example of it at Florence, as M. Gnoli is at Rome, M. Zumbini at Naples, and M. Bersezio at Turin. There are many more brilliant and eloquent critics. But in all of these there is more seeking after effect than truth—too much personality. The details are sometimes good, but the general effect is exaggeration. Individualism, in spite of political unity, is too powerful in Italy, and only the sentiment of the ideal can raise the Italian artist above his own personality and make him generalize his work.

But the ideal has become a bore. It is false, it is old. So our writers think. To be true we must be atheists, republicans, socialists, nihilists. These theories, formerly whispered, are now preached aloud. I do not see yet the beginning of the end. I fear worse things are in store for us. Still I have confidence in the future, and I am sure that both in Italy and France there will be a reconciliation with reason and good sense. I need not trouble myself with the names of the innovators, and I shall mention only the chief workers of the year with whose writings I am acquainted. I know I shall omit a great many in a rapid sketch, but I do not aim at a catalogue or bibliography of Italian literature. I only wish to indicate some of the books of the year to which my attention has been drawn.

Among books of a higher class may be first mentioned the Year-book of Italian Literature, soon to be published by Barbera of Florence, a work compiled by two promising young Tuscan scholars, Guido Biagi and Guido Mazzoni, in which will be found many details that here must be passed over. The former has begun a new collection of rare and inedited Italian books, to be published by Sansoni of Florence, with an annotated edition of the 'Novellino,' to which he has prefixed an exhaustive introduction. Guido Mazzoni has already given us a volume of elegant verse, besides translations of Meleager's epigrams, and three essays on the works of Prof. Cesarotti, whose life and character he intends to describe in a monograph of importance. He is a pupil of Prof. D'Ancona, who has just republished his best essays under the title of 'Studi di Critica e Storia Letteraria.'

We expect soon to see a book of much interest as regards the history of our popular Italian theatre—'Scenari Inediti della Commedia dell'Arte,' by Prof. Bartoli. This book will contain some twenty sketches of comedies as improvised by the strolling players of old times. That independent critic Gaetano Trezza has reprinted, under the title 'Nuovi Studi Critici,' his essays, of which the main characteristic is scepticism based upon positivist philosophy. A Calabrian professor, Giuseppe De Leonardi, gives us the poetry of spiritualism in his lively book 'L'Arte e la Vita dello Spirito.' Prof. Jacopo Ferrazzi, author of the 'Enciclopedia Dantesca,' has published this year an interesting book—'Studi Biografici-Critici-Bibliografici sopra Torquato Tasso.' In the Nuova Antologia of the year we have already read the letters of A. Manzoni addressed to his friend Fauriel, and now Luigi Venturi, of Florence, brings out an excellent critique of Manzoni's tragedies and lyrical poems. A good memoir of the poet may be found in the 'Scritti Biografici' of Prof. Prina.

Among other biographical and historical books that should be named is Prof. Ottolenghi's interesting memoir of Luigi Provana del Sabbione, a precursor of the liberal movement in Piedmont. With some considerable additions Carlo Cocchetti has republished his book, 'Il Movimento Intellettuale nella Provincia di Brescia dai Tempi Antichi ai Nostri.' The Sicilian philosopher Vincenzo Di Giovanni has published a work entitled 'Severino Boezio, Filosofo, e i suoi Imitatori.' An enlarged edition of Prof. A. Valdarnini's monograph on Francis Bacon has lately appeared. In 'Dante e la Statistica delle Lingue' the Deputy Filippo Mariotti endeavours to show the causes of that harmony of style which pervades the 'Divina Commedia.' A book to be studied by all lovers of Tuscan Italian is 'Delizie del Parlare Toscano,' by Giambattista Giuliani, the illustrious commentator on Dante. His collection of Sicilian proverbs has been completed lately by Giuseppe Pitri; and his eminent coadjutor Salvatore Salomone-Marino has collected in one volume the interesting 'Leggende Popolari Siciliane.' The sixty popular Tuscan stories lately published by Gherardo Nerucci have all been collected in his native village, Montale. Prof. S. Prato of Spoleto has just illustrated in an elaborate essay four hundred popular tales of Leghorn and their variations. To his collection of songs in the dialect of Bova in Calabria the editor, A. Pellegrini, has added an introduction and a useful glossary. Here may be named a 'Vocabolario dell'Uso Abruzzese,' to which the compiler, Gennaro Finamore, has prefixed a sort of grammar of the dialect. Prof. Napoleone Caix has produced a useful linguistic book, 'Le Origini della Lingua Poetica Italiana: Principi di Grammatica Storica Italiana.' Another book of the class is the 'Vulgare Illustre dal Secolo VII. fino a Dante,' by the Venetian philologist Andrea Gloria. Prof. L. Sailer has prepared for the use of young students an 'Introduzione allo Studio della Letteratura.' The Nestor of Italian Latinists, Prof. Vallauri, has collected in one volume all his Latin inscriptions, to which Prof. Berrini has prefixed a study of their style. Antonio Spoto, a Sicilian priest, has given proofs of astonishingly patient labour by translating into Latin hexameters the poem 'I Lombardi alla Prima Crociata,' by Tommaso Grossi, and has also translated into Latin a poem on Adèle de Bourgogne, by Prince Giuseppe De Spuches. The prince, an elegant poet, has this year published a new edition of his translation of Euripides. Among the learned books of the year is a critical and historical monograph on Epimenides of Crete by Giuseppe Barone. An important catalogue of the Hebrew manuscripts preserved in the University Library of Turin has been edited by Prof. Bernardino Peyron. A catalogue of the Roman coins belonging to the second half of the third century has been learnedly prepared by a young archaeologist, Luigi Adriano Milani. Of the translation of Plato undertaken by Ruggiero Bonghi, already the 'Euthyphro' and the 'Apology of Socrates' have appeared, enriched with commentaries which add largely to the value of the translation.

Turning to historical works, I have to notice a conscientious study by Prof. Giuseppe Morosi, 'Intorno al Motivo dell' Abdicazione dell' Imperatore Diocleziano.' 'La Storia di Venezia nella Vita Privata,' an interesting work, full of anecdotes, has won a prize offered by the Institute of Venice. Connoisseurs of faience will read with interest a book written by Carlo Malagola, 'Memorie Storiche sulle Maioliche di Faenza'; and for the history of Flemish art it will be well to consult A. Bertolotti's 'Artisti Belgi ed Olandesi a Roma nei Secoli XVI. e XVII.' To our library of voyages and travels Giovanni Pellegrini has added his book, 'Otto Mesi nel Gran Ciocco'; and the traveller Pellegrino Matteucci has given us his 'Viaggio in Abissinia,' the same intrepid traveller who has just returned with Prince Borghese from a journey of exploration. Geography and ethnology applied to politics have furnished Prof. Bruniati with an opportunity for writing a most conscientious book showing the greatest competence and singular good sense in all questions relating to the partition of Turkey. This book is called 'Gli Credi della Turchia.' Paolo Lioty, poet and naturalist, in his pleasant book 'In Montagna,' gives descriptions that may tempt Alpine climbers, and they may also like 'Aria di Monti,' by Giuseppe Corona. Children will find an amusing Italian guide in 'Il Viaggio di Giannettino,' by "Collodi" (the nom de plume of C. Lorenzini), a humorous and pleasant writer; while for Naples and its environs a lively guide has been supplied by Signora Cesira Pozzolini Siciliani. Her husband, the well-known professor at Bologna, gives us this year another educational work—his 'Massimi Problemi nella Pedagogia Moderna.' The Institute of Lombardy has lately awarded a prize to a book written by Prof. Morelli—an essay on 'Suicide.' A 'Storia e Teoria Generale della Statistica' has been published by Prof. A. Gabaglio, and two books by Senator Rossi on social economy, 'Perché una Legge?' (on the question of employing children's labour) and an essay entitled 'Del Credito Popolare.' Prof. Albert Errera has written two important essays on primary education, industrial, professional, and commercial, in Belgium. The Senator Louis Zini has written eloquent letters on 'The Government of the Left.' Prof. Capello has edited 'La Logica,' a work left unpublished by G. M.

Bertini. A long lost 'Cantica' by Giacomo Leopardi has been edited by Zanino Volta. Leopardi has also been the subject of several, probably too many, articles. A. Ranieri, the friend of Leopardi, has been very communicative—too communicative, perhaps—in publishing an account of his own intimate converse with the poet in a book styled 'Sette Anni di Sodalizio con Giacomo Leopardi.'

My article would be long were I to merely mention all the novels and volumes of verse which have come under my notice this year. Of the former I may name 'Il Roccolo di Sant' Alipio,' by A. Caccianiga; 'Vita dei Campi,' by G. Verga; 'Nella Lotta,' by E. Castelnovo; and 'Prime Battaglie, Villa Eugenia,' by "Cordelia." Among the second are 'Sermoni,' by T. Massarani; 'In Solitudine,' by T. Cannizzaro; 'Amore e Dolore,' by M. A. Canini; 'Poesie Minime,' by L. Pinelli; 'Il Femminile Eterno,' by David Levi; a volume by "Ausonio Liberto" (G. Levantini-Pieroni); and the 'Liriche di A. Petrosi,' translated by P. E. Bolla. Among the translations of Italian books published abroad this year I may mention one by Salvatore Farina, issued by Hachette at Paris.

Is this all? I think not. Is it worth signing this meagre enumeration of the titles of Italian books? I am still less inclined to think that. Yet, since the indulgence of the readers of the Athenæum encourages me, I sign. If I cannot mention here all the names of my countrymen, it is not my fault. In the course of ten years I believe I have mentioned a great many, if all are put together. People in Italy will not suppose me prejudiced; on the other hand, Englishmen will see that in these ten years Italian literature has not been the insignificant thing they imagined it to be, perhaps, before the Athenæum commenced these annual summaries.

ANGELO DE GUBERNATIS.

NORWAY.

ABOUT a generation ago the lyrical form of expression was that most in favour among the best Norwegian writers. All Norse poets then were lyrists, and their chief masterpieces were of the lyric order. This was true in the most opposite directions, in Wergeland as in Welhaven, in Jørgen Moe no less than in A. Munch.

Now it is altogether otherwise. The lyric has ceased to be the favourite; it is even treated as the child of the bondswoman. It would almost seem as though the singing vein were exhausted in our literature. Henrik Ibsen, who in his youth poured songs in profusion out of his horn of plenty, has for the last ten years confined his attention strictly to the drama, which, indeed, has always formed the chief part of his repertory; and Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson, who twenty years ago was an excellent lyricist, seems now to have lost both the power and the will. The new edition of his 'Digte og Sange,' which appeared last spring, shows this in a very striking manner. Besides the poems to be found in the issue of 1870, the edition of 1880 contains a small number of a later date, and most of these are singularly sterile in feeling and tame in expression. Only one of our younger authors has sought to win popularity as a lyricist.

This is Kristofer Randers, whose second volume of poems, a series of erotic reflections, has just appeared under the title of 'Vaarbrud.' His verses are easy and correct, but too imitative to allow us to see much of his own individuality.

It is, therefore, not the lyric, but the drama and the novel, to which we must turn to see what is best in the recent literature of Norway; and these two forms of imaginative work have made great progress of late.

About twenty years ago a pastoral névêlé was the thing most admired in Scandinavia, just as in Germany at the beginning of the century. From the complicated life of towns people turned to the pleasures of solitude, from the culture of the present to the simplicity of the past. The Norse peasant, who pursues his sequestered labours with an utter indifference to the strife of cities, was the hero of the moment, and to his glorification Bjørnson dedicated his famous pastoral idyll, whilst Ibsen in his historical dramas magnified the primitive life and manners of his ancestors. To these writers succeeded their contemporary, but follower, Jonas Lie, who in his first and best books painted the stormy life of fisher-folk, pilots, and mariners on the Norse sea-coast.

During the last decade, however, the Norwegian writers have left these idyllic themes, and have given themselves to the relations produced by modern cultivated life. Ibsen was the first to abandon history, and, after a polemical period of transition, exclusively to dedicate himself to the service of modern drama. Bjørnson followed his example, and now only writes plays of to-day. Lastly, and with least success, Jonas Lie has undergone the same change. His novels 'Thomas Roes' and 'Adam Schrøder' are both taken from modern life, and in his drama, published a month or two ago, 'Grabows Kat,' he has attempted to follow his two more illustrious colleagues. The hero of the piece is a clever young painter, who cannot concentrate his talent on his art, and whose first love, an attachment to his master's daughter, inspires him with the necessary determination to study. He produces a work so fine that he is rewarded with the hand of his sweetheart, after the father, in a fit of irritation, has destroyed the picture. The idea of the piece is not particularly new, and our age, as Georg Brandes has said, does not look upon genius as an inspired idler, but as an inspired worker. Moreover, the drama has technical shortcomings, and may, in connexion with his recent novels, be taken as proof that Jonas Lie does not possess the peculiar gift needful for excellence in these modern themes. In his latest work, a story called 'Rutland,' which has just appeared, he has, however, left this path, and gone back to the field in which he won his early laurels. The main figure, which gives name to this novel, is an old North Sea brigantine. On account of its age and weakness it is degraded to the rank of sloop, and as such carries on a coasting trade in Norway. It is old enough and crazy enough for Mr. Plimsoll to style it a coffin, but the captain and his wife, who always accompanies him, are so quaint and fresh a couple that life seems very agreeable on board the old Rutland. The construction of the plot, as always with Jonas Lie, is rather weak, but the attention of the reader is fascinated and retained by a whole series of bright and vivacious studies of life on board and on shore. A healthy and refreshing sea-breeze seems to blow through the book, which proves that the author has happily rediscovered the true bent of his genius.

The young author Alexander Kjelland has produced another charming work in his novel 'Garman & Worse,' which sketches life in one of the large towns of the west coast of Norway. Yet this novel also is weakly constructed so far as the story goes. The helplessness of the writer is as comic and pathetic as the naïveté of a mediæval painter. His characters stand all on the same level, and are distributed through the story without any unity in composition. In other words, the author lacks perspective, and his talent merely enables him to present us with a series of masterly fragments. Herr Kjelland made his début as a novelist two years ago with a little collection of novelettes, which charmed the public with their delicacy and fineness of touch. This year he has published a second collection of novelettes, which, however, unfortunately are much less interesting than the former. Kjelland has also attempted dramatic work in publishing last autumn a volume called 'For Scenen,' containing two proverbes and a comedy in two acts. The proverbes alone have been publicly performed. The interesting and promising qualities which these dramatic pieces undoubtedly display are injured by a lack of experience and knowledge of stage requirements.

An elderly lady, Maren Vinesen, has published in her 'In Drammen Seventy Years Ago' an agreeable and chatty sketch of life in the town of that name. Another aged author, Maria Colban, in her new story 'Cleopatra,' has drawn a picture of manners among the old Italian aristocracy. From Italy also Johan Paulsen has taken the material for several stories, which he has collected under the title of 'Langt fra Norge,' and for a longer novel, 'Margherita,' in which he shows himself an imitator of Emile Zola, but without the genius of his prototype. The old poet Andreas Munch, too, has taken from Italian history the subject of an historical poem, 'Pave og Reformator,' the hero of which is the pious Pope Adrian VI., who vainly attempted to prop the sinking Church in the sixteenth century. Kristian Glaseren has published a new novel, 'En Fremmed.'

In the historical literature of the year should be mentioned first and foremost the opening volume of Prof. O. Rygh's 'Norske Oldsager ordnede og forklarede,' a work of great importance in archaeology. A very important and interesting contribution to the history of archaic art has been made by Prof. L. Dietrichson in his 'Christusbilledet,' an investigation of the origin and development of the typical portrait of Christ. Prof. P. O. Schjøtt has published a treatise on Athens before the time of Solon. Dr. Yngvar Nielsen one on the constitution of the Norse State Council, and Yngvald Undset a work on the archaeology of the Bronze Age.

The anxiously awaited work of Prof. Sophus Bugge on the influence of Hebrew and Greco-Roman religion on the Scandinavian legends of gods and heroes is now passing through the press. In the first volume of his book the author will treat the myths of Balder and of Yggdrasil. The Icelandic form of the Balder myth is, in the opinion of the learned author, modified by the story of the death of Christ, whilst that preserved by Saxo bears more relation to the story of Achilles. Prof. Bugge gives reasons for his belief that Balder was unknown among the Germans. In the Yggdrasil myth he sees references to the cross of Christ, which is identified with the Tree of Life. In the opinion of Prof. Bugge the myth was introduced during the Viking period by sailors who met with the Christian legends in the British Isles.

HENRIK JÆGER.

POLAND.

My review this year will again begin most appropriately with a report of what has been done in the domain of historical literature. The most important work that has appeared is certainly the first volume of 'The Four Years' Imperial Parliament' (1788-1791), by Valerian Kalinka, a clergyman. It may be called a thoroughly classic work, and, taken as a whole, worthy the pen of a Macaulay, although it undoubtedly shows some trace of the pessimistic tendency which is at present so prevalent among Polish historians. The book treats of one of the most important points in the past history of Poland, i.e., the period in which the nation, seeing its political existence threatened, endeavoured to save itself by internal reforms. The Four Years' Parliament, as is well known, ended with the proclamation of the so-called constitution of May 3rd (1791), which may be regarded as a spiritual legacy of the old Poland to the future. The publication of the literary remains of Jul. Bartoszewicz has been continued throughout the past year, and four new volumes have appeared. Two young men, Tud. Wojciechowski and Lud. Kubala, have come forward as excellent historians: the former in a treatise on 'The Polish Annals from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century,' more particularly as a trustworthy and well-informed investigator; the latter in his 'Historical Sketches,' as a powerful writer of history. Dr. Anton J. (whose real name is Dr. Rolle) has published 'Three Historical Narratives' and 'The Castles of Podolia,' the latter of which has just reached a second edition; this author is distinguished for his popular and attractive style of writing. Jos. Szujewski, an able professor at the Cracow University, who is looked upon as the leader of the so-called Cracow school of history, has produced a 'History of Poland' in twelve books. Among the monographs must be mentioned those by Ossolin'ski, the Grand Treasurer of the Crown; by Klem. Kantechi; those on the Electorate of the House of Jagellon, by Count Kasimir Stadnichi; and the 'History of the United Church,' by a clergyman, Edw. Likowski. Among the works which illustrate, and will serve as a source for inquiring into, the immediate past, and particularly into the revolutionary movements in Poland, may be mentioned Sig. Milkowski's 'Galicia and the East,' and the 'Memoirs of General Ant. Jezioranski' (1848-1863), one of the most prominent figures in the insurrection of 1863. Other works on historical subjects have been issued by Fr. Pickosinski, Wlad.

Wislocki, Fr. Kulczycki, and Kaa. Waliszewski; the latter two have, moreover, taken as their subject the times of John III., in anticipation of the 200th anniversary of the release of Vienna by this king, which is to be celebrated in 1883.

Almost the only writer of lyrics during the late troubled times is Adam Asnyk. Last year there appeared the third volume of his poems, and, like the two previous volumes, they are distinguished by their exquisite form and graceful vein of melancholy. By his side I must also mention two gifted ladies, Marie Bartus and M. Konopnicka, and the anonymous author of a collection of poems which were published in Cracow under the title of 'Iwur: a Game of Chess,' &c. When I further add that F. Falenski has, with great artistic skill, made a complete translation of Petrarch into the Polish language, and that Prof. Popiel has published a new translation of Homer's Iliad, I have mentioned all the more notable works in this branch of literature.

In the drama the first place must be assigned to Count Alexander Fredro, who died two years ago. There have recently been published thirteen volumes of his works, which, among other things, contain sixteen comedies. The half of these have now been published for the first time as his literary remains; his earlier comedies, however, will retain their position of pre-eminence. Fredro is called the Molière of Poland, and most justly so. He has not, indeed, written a 'Tartuffe,' but, owing to his inexhaustible flow of humour and his pregnant delineations of character, he will always rank among the first of writers of comedy. E. Iubowski's comedy, 'The Court of Honour,' was performed in Warsaw with great applause, and was specially praised as a successful gallery of different types of character. A piece that likewise enjoyed great popularity was Wlad. Anczyk's 'The Peasants' Emigration,' which is directed against the ever-increasing desire shown by the Galician peasantry to emigrate (especially to America). Another popular piece of the same genus is the work of an actor in Cracow, Galasiewicz, and has as its title 'The Devil's Bench.' Sig. Sarnecki, the well-known writer of comedies, has published three of his earlier plays in one volume, and others will no doubt follow. Among the historical dramas I must mention Vinz. Rapacki's 'Pro Honore Domus'; Julian von Poradow's 'The Countess Goryalawa'; and from the pen of Bron. Grabowski, whose favourite subjects are taken from Slavonic life, we have 'The Son of the Margrave' and 'The Prince Marks.' I should perhaps also mention that translations have been made of three of the tragedies of Euripides, 'Medea' (by St. Grabowski), 'Alcestis,' and 'Andromache' (by S. Wedlewski).

Jos. Ign. Krazewski, whose name has become so widely known throughout the whole civilized world since last year's jubilee, has not been resting upon his well-earned laurels. During the past year his pen has more particularly been devoted to his cycle of historical romances, the object of which is to illustrate the whole history of Poland in a poetical form. The last of these romances, 'Cracow in the Days of King Ladislaus Lokietek,' already brings us up to the fourteenth century, and is the twelfth of the series. A work by the same author entitled 'The Troubled Spirits' (two volumes) is a faithful picture of the times, and will certainly be regarded as one of the best productions of this excellent writer. An author who has suddenly entered the front ranks of literature is a young man named Sienkiewicz (whose nom de plume is "Litwos"). The three volumes containing his novels and letters (from America, Rome, and Paris show him to possess decided and original talent as well as warmth of feeling. The most humorous of Polish writers, Joh. Lam, who invariably makes political satire the background of his delineations, has published a new novel, 'The Wonderful Career'; and another humourist, Al. Wilczynski, who excels in his knowledge of the life and customs of the aristocracy of his country, has given us a work called 'The Mission of the Familia.' Val. Przyborowski has been unusually active during the past year, for within this period he has published four historical novels. Stan. Grudziński has a large circle of readers for his 'Tales of the Ukraine,' and so likewise has Jos. Rogozz for his three new novels, more particularly 'The Dreamers.'

In the other departments of literature I have still to mention Prof. Anton Malecki's 'Comparative Historical Grammar of the Polish Language' (two volumes), which, in spite of some adverse criticism, must be acknowledged to be a most valuable book; also, a 'Sanskrit Grammar,' by Naw. Malinowski, a priest and scholar; Oskar Kolberg's ethnographical publication, 'The People' (i.e., the Poles), of which the thirteenth volume has just appeared; 'The Jubilee Book,' written in honour of Kraszewski, which contains his biography and criticisms of his works by more than twenty different writers; further, the 'Geographical Lexicon of Poland,' which was commenced in Warsaw; and lastly the Corn, a publication with illustrations of the same kind as the French Paris-Murcie, and written with a similar purpose.

ADAM BELCİKOWSKI.

PORTUGAL.

THE year 1880 has been one of the most prolific in the annals of Portuguese literature, and the festivals connected with the tercentenary of Camoens thoroughly roused the national spirit. On all sides there were given lectures and historical readings connected with the sixteenth century, treating of the life and deeds of the author of the 'Lusiads' and of the part taken by Portugal in the development of European civilization. Every one who could use pen, pencil, or brush gladly contributed to this popular expression of devotion to the embodiment of our greatest national glory. The 10th of July will ever remain in the history of the Portuguese people as the date upon which the national conscience unanimously vibrated to the stimulus of a profound emotion. I will not dwell upon the grandeur of the festes in every part of the Portuguese territory; they exceeded all expectations. From the tercentenary of Camoens are dated many important foundations, such as the Association of Portuguese Writers and Journalists; also several editions, more or less valuable and ornamental, of the 'Lusiads,' and many poems and critical and historical studies on the life and writings of the poet, which of themselves form a vast collection, and which the Camonians have religiously gathered together. On the occasion of the tercentenary of Camoens there were published two bibliographies of all the editions of the 'Lusiads,' also enumerating the translations and the essays on the poet, both Portuguese and foreign. The 'Bibliographia Camoniana,' organized by Senhor Theophilo Braga, was published at the cost of Dr. Antonio Augusto de Carvalho Monteiro, and was gratuitously offered to all the public libraries of Europe, as well as to all men of letters noted for their appreciation of the literature of Portugal. This edition is certainly a magnificent one, and does honour to our press. Dr. Carvalho Monteiro fully comprehended the value of this homage to the memory of Camoens, and it may be said that without his assistance and stimulus this biographical work would not have been undertaken. The 'Bibliographia Camoniana' is formed after the mode of Ferrazzi in his bibliographies of Dante and of Petrarch. During the celebration of the tercentenary in Oporto there was also published another 'Bibliographia Camoniana,' compiled by Joaquim de Vasconcellos. These two works exhaust the subject, and the extent of their contents proves the vastness of the Camonian literature.

Among the poems dedicated to Camoens the principal are 'A Fome de Camoens,' by Gomes Leal, in stanzas rima, which displays some marks of inspiration; 'Catherina de Athayde,' by Macedo Papança, a poem which was recited before the members of the University of Coimbra; and the 'Lira Camoniana,' by Teixeira Bastos, which has a philosophical undercurrent. Thomaz Ribeiro, Alexandre da Conceição, Jayme Segur, in short, nearly all the chief Portuguese poets, celebrated the genius of Camoens. There was represented a drama, in five acts, called 'Camoens,' and written expressly for the tercentenary by Cypriano Jardim. The drama may be called ultra-historic, and consequently it seems dull when acted, but nevertheless it was found worthy of eighteen representations.

The Academician Senhor Latino Coelho, who amongst us is noted for the excellence and purity of his style, published the opening volume of a series to be called "A Galeria de Varões Ilustres de Portugal." It consists of a biographical study of Luiz de Camoens; the book is remarkable for want of knowledge of the subject, and especially of the critical works published during the last twenty years. The Viscount de Juromenha advertises an analysis of this work, which, to tell the truth, is unworthy of the fame of its author.

Mr. Robert Ffrench Duff published a new English translation of the 'Lusiads,' extremely well done and in no way inferior to that of Mr. Aubertin. It must, moreover, be taken into consideration that Mr. Duff used the Spenserian stanza, which does not assimilate well with the octave rhyme of Camoens, which Mr. Aubertin adopted. Prof. Wilhelm Starck published a German translation of the lyrics of Camoens, truly commendable for fidelity and comprehension of the Portuguese text; we may now assert that it is not Shakespeare alone who has in the German tongue the most beautiful of interpretations.

At present there exists a certain agitation in Portugal, but an agitation purely of a moral or mental character. The rising generation seems to devote itself to the work of a scientific propaganda. There have just been held in this country two congresses, one literary, the other anthropological, and consequently the reviews and journals advocate the necessity of reading, because there is no question that this country owes its backwardness in a great measure to mental apathy. The review of the contemporary movement, A Era Nova, is now in its sixth number; it is publishing 'A Historia do Romantismo em Portugal,' in which is discussed the influence of the three great writers Garrett, Herculano, and Castilho. The admirers of Herculano, finding the strictures on their idol too severe, have opened a national subscription to erect a monument to his memory. It is certain that Herculano exercised an evil influence upon Portuguese society. Until 1836 he always wrote in favour of the monks in the Panorama, and afterwards interrupted on account of personal misunderstandings his 'History of Portugal'; he caused a sort of prostration of public spirit, and he embarrassed the march of the Portuguese conscience by his Catholic tendencies. Oliveira Martins has just published a popular treatise on anthropology, a useful book, considering we have little or nothing on the subject, but, imperfect as its information is, very superficial. There have just been published two romances, 'A Vida Atribulada,' by Julio Lourenço Pinto, and 'O Mandarim,' by Eça de Queiroz. The first shows the best intentions; it has a style somewhat artificial, and its author imitates a little the realistic school of Zola, but falls into the defect of being carried away by the romantic adventures he depicts. 'O Mandarim,' on the other hand, reveals all the qualifications of the great author of the 'Crime do Padre Amado' and of 'Primo Basilio,' but the fantastic nature of the subject renders it nothing more than a piece of literary pastime, without plot or purpose; and it is really lamentable that a writer of first-class talent should waste his energies on such a trivial work, merely written for the occasion. Joaquim de Vasconcellos has published the celebrated manuscript of Francisco de Hollanda, which used to be kept in the Academy of Sciences, where nothing of importance ever seems to be accomplished. In this way private enterprise corrects the torpor of this official corporation. 'A Historia das Ideias Democraticas em Portugal' is finished; it contains the evolution of the idea of national sovereignty from the Cortes of 1641 to the actual formation of the republican centres in which preponderate the theories of federalism.

An Oporto house has commenced the publication of a modern scientific library; the first volume is called the 'Origens Poeticas do Christianismo.' In this work for the first time are applied the fundamental ideas of the great English ethnologist Tylor. The same house also announces the publication of a book by the young professor Conseglieri Pedroso on 'A Constituição da Familia.' There has also just been published the third edition of the 'Theoria da Historia da Litteratura Portuguesa,' in which use is made of the contents of the excellent publication of Niemeyer of Halle, the Portuguese Cancioneiro Colocci-Brancuti. This Cancioneiro, recently found in Italy, solves the question of the Portuguese origin of 'Amadis de Gaul,' and besides many historical particulars contains some precious fragments of Provençal poetry, which I suppose to have been written for the study of King Dom Diniz. The great lyric poet of the present Portuguese generation, João de Deus, has in the press a new book of verses, which is anxiously expected; the poets Chrysostom Ayres, Barros Seixas, Fernando Leal, and Luiz de Magalhães have also contributed volumes of appreciable verses, of which it may be said, as Lope de Vega said of lovers, "They have a Portuguese soul." Ethnological studies are gaining ground, and at present have given rise to many publications on stories, songs, superstitions, and popular Portuguese customs. It is to be regretted that this country is so badly governed. There has just been promulgated a new law regulating secondary instruction in schools, which is shamefully reactionary in its provisions. Here, unfortunately, progress is only attained by the divergence of men's minds.

THEOPHILO BRAGA.

SPAIN.

I HAVE for some time remarked that the books which have appeared during each year show a marked improvement in their efforts to popularize subjects of a scientific kind. This is even more the case in 1880. We find the same interest in looking out for and publishing MSS. which had long lain forgotten in libraries, or re-editing rare books which were hitherto known only to a small number of collectors; these form in the present day in Spain an important series of publications and one of great interest. Translations from classical authors are becoming every day more popular; they have been eminently useful in rendering familiar to Spaniards a number of important works which twenty years ago were only read by a small circle of learned men. We find this year whole editions exhausted of classical authors, and some excellent studies on subjects relating to science. It is a great pity, and does much harm by lowering the standard of serious publications, that the Government spends so much in purchasing books. A large sum is set apart for this purpose by the Ministry of Public Works every year; in some ways the expenditure is praiseworthy, but the funds have generally been most injudiciously laid out, the works selected having been chosen mostly on account of the influence possessed by the authors, and not because of the merits of the works themselves. The most important book which has appeared this year is the first part of 'Las Quinquagenas de la Nobleza de España,' by Capt. Gonzalo Fernandez de Oviedo; it has been printed at the cost of the Academy of History, and edited with great care by the learned Academician, Dr. Vico de la Fuente. Oviedo was governor of the fortress of Santo Domingo, and the first author of a general history of the Indies. He knew during his long life (1478-1557) the most important persons who figured in the Spanish court; he was always a minute observer of the customs of his time, and a most industrious writer until the last. He left two valuable works, which are of the highest interest and illustrate the history of his time, but which have never been printed before. One is this volume of the 'Quinquagenas,' which is full of curious details of the lives of Spaniards and foreign persons of importance, the organization of the councils in Spain during the early part of the sixteenth century, the administration of justice, the ceremonials and etiquette of the palace, and even the fashions inside and outside the Peninsula. The other book by the same author, which is to be published in the same manner when this one is finished, is 'Batallas,' and contains exclusively the biographies of celebrated Spaniards. Señor la Fuente has also brought out during the present year two interesting works: 'Historia de la Ciudad de Calatayud,' which gives a minute history of that town, the birthplace of the poet Martial, and the fifty-first volume of 'España Sagrada,' begun by Friar Florez in the last century, published this year by the Academy under La Fuente's supervision. The fifty-first to the fifty-fourth volumes of "Coleccion de Documentos Ineditos para la Historia de España" have appeared this year. These volumes are edited by the Marques de la Fuca Santa and Señors Sancho Rayon and Zabalburu. They contain the entertaining narratives of Capt. Vazquez describing the events which happened in France and the Low Countries during the campaigns of Farnesio from 1631 to 1658. These same gentlemen have brought out the thirtieth and thirty-first volumes of the "Coleccion de Documentos Ineditos," relating to the discovery, conquest, and organization of the ancient Spanish possessions in America and Oceania, chiefly from inedited MSS. in Spanish archives. The fifth volume of "Biblioteca Hispano Ultramarina" has also appeared; this publication is most excellent, and contains two learned works by the well-known scholar Jimenez de la Espada; the second part of the 'Cronica del Peru,' by Cieza de Leon; and 'Suma y Narracion de los Incas del Cuzco,' by Juan de Betanzos. The second volume of the 'Vida y Escritos de las Casas, Obispo de Chiapa,' has been brought out by Señor Fabié, and the second volume of 'Historia del Descubrimiento de las Regiones Australes,' by Fernandez de Quiros, edited by Señor Zaragoza.

Among books of a more entertaining kind reproduced from rare editions may be mentioned the 'Romancero de Pedro de Padilla,' which forms the twenty-second volume of the series of "Bibliofilos Españoles." These romances describe the campaigns of the Spaniards in Flanders during the reign of Philip II.; those which allude to the imprisonment and death of Count Egmont and Count Horn are most interesting. The rest of the volume is taken up with Spanish legends, epistles, and songs.

A book of a similar style is the 'Propaladia,' by Torres Naharro, most valuable to students interested in tracing the origin of the Spanish theatre. It has been edited and enriched with copious notes by Señor Canete, one of the best Spanish critics. Photo-lithographic reproductions of the letters of Santa Teresa and of the 'Tratado de la Ginebra,' by Cespedes, have also appeared, and a reprint of the curious volume by Father Mariana, 'Del Rey y de la Institucion Real,' which produced so much excitement when it first appeared that it was burned in Paris in the public place during the reign of Henri IV. Señor Tinajero has edited the quaint twelve books on agriculture by Columella. A professor of the University of Strasbourg, Herr Eduard Boehmer, has printed in Madrid the 'Evangelio segun San Mateo, Declarado por Juan de Valdes.' This edition is most excellent. Hitherto the numerous biographers of Valdes have considered that the manuscript was lost, but Herr Boehmer was fortunate enough to meet with a copy in the Library of Vienna, and it is now printed for the first time.

The Anales de Historia Natural give the best idea of the progress made in natural history and science. Many of the articles are not very important, but they show progress; for thirty years ago Spain was extraordinarily backward in such subjects. The Commission appointed to draw up the geological map of Spain has published 'Geologico y Petrografico de la Provincia de Sevilla,' by Macpherson; 'Reconocimiento Geologico de la Provincia de Badajoz,' by Tarin; 'Resena Geologica de Ibiza,' by Vidal; and 'Mapa Geologico de España y Portugal, 1:2,000,000,' by Botella,—these productions are especially interesting, for they are entirely on local subjects.

Besides the great number of translations which have appeared this year of scientific works, there are some few important and original ones written by Spaniards. The best are 'Flora de las Islas Baleares,' by Barcelo, which is most valuable for botanists to study the plants of the Balearic Islands; 'Curso de Metalurgia,' by Barinaga; 'La Materia Radiante,' by Monzelo; 'Problemas de Calculo Algebraico,' by Terry; 'Geologia Agricola,' by Vilanova; and the exhaustive 'Tratado de Histologia Normal y Patologica,' by Maestre, which, dedicated to Prof. Schwann, the originator of cellular theories, is especially interesting.

Although legal studies have produced in Spain numerous discussions in clubs and meetings, the books which have appeared on these subjects are of little importance. The best undoubtedly is Señor Azcarate's second volume of 'Ensayo sobre la Historia del Derecho de Propiedad'; Costa's 'Derecho Consuetudinario del Alto Aragon y Teoria del Derecho Juridico'; 'Historia del Derecho Romano,' by Crespo; and Reus's 'Ensayos Juridicos Politicos.'

There appears to be a revival of the study of classic authors in Spain, which for so long had been put on one side. A Mexican bishop, Señor Montes de Oca, has brought out in Madrid an excellent edition of the Greek Bucolic poets; Barabiar, Aristophanes' comedies; Mier, the second part of Euripides' plays; Longui, Plato's Dialogues; Ranz, Plutarch's Lives; and Hidalgo, Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics. The students of the Madrid University acted, at the Teatro Español, Plautus's 'Captives' with singular success.

Some books deserve a favourable notice which do not belong to any especial group. Muñoz's 'Paleografia Diplomatica Española de los Siglos XII. al XVII.' is the best study which exists in Spain of this subject.

'Imperio de Marruecos,' by Ilana y Rodríguez; 'Los Arabes,' by Señor Urtezarazu; 'Campanas del Duque de Alba,' by Señor Arbus; and Sales's 'Prehistoria y Origen de la Civilización,' are all books worth reading. Amateurs of bull-fights will welcome with interest the 'Gran Pie. Tauro Máquico,' by Sanchez; 'Glorias del Torero,' by Gonzalez; and 'Efemerides Taurinas,' by Vazquez.

Books in belles-lettres have not been particularly successful this year. Two authors, however, head the list with works of a very high order: Señor Collado with his 'Poesias' and Nuñez de Arce with 'La Vision de Fray Martin.' Some of the poems written of late years by Collado are charming, and so pure in style that they remind the reader of the best models of the Spanish language. Arce has chosen for the subject of his poem an episode from the life of Martin Luther. It is treated in the grand and broad manner of which he is undoubtedly a master.

The dramatic works of the year have not been of great interest. The best are 'Lo que Vale el Teatro,' by Echevarria; 'La Mariposa,' by Cano; 'Llvido del Cielo,' by Vital; and Echevarria's last drama, 'La Muerte en los Labios.' The subject chosen by this fertile author is Calvin's unjust persecution of the Spanish doctor Servetus and his death at Geneva, where he was burned at Calvin's instigation. The whole drama is full of the most dramatic situations, the second act being very fine. Mention must also be made of the excellent translations of Shakespeare by W. Macpherson. He has published during the last year 'Macbeth' and 'Romeo,' both translated into Spanish verse, and so accurately that it would be difficult in any language to find a better translation of the great dramatist. It may even bear comparison with Schlegel's admirable rendering of the original.

The novels of the year have not been numerous. Alarcon's 'Niño de la Bola,' although coarsely conceived and badly put together, is full of charming descriptions of Spanish scenery and local customs which will render it acceptable to the general reader. Galdís has added a volume to his series, 'Un Faccioso Mas y Algunos Frailes Menos'; Trueta, 'Nuevos cuentos populares'; and Melida a learned archaeological novel in the manner of Prof. Elers, 'El Sortilegio de Karnac.' Menonero Romanos's 'Memorias de un Setentón' may well figure among this group. It is a most charming and entertaining book, and invaluable to the student of modern history. The author relates the events which have occurred in Spain during a period of about fifty years, beginning with the fusillading of the ill-fated Spaniards on the 2nd of May, 1808, and other episodes of the Peninsular War. The unfortunate and disgraceful reign of Ferdinand VII. is described in a most vivid manner, and so are the numerous political changes of the reign of Isabel II.

Castelar's admirable 'Discurso' on entering the Spanish Academy was sufficiently commented upon by all the leading foreign journals at the time not to require any further description. Like other productions of this gifted author, it is full of finely written and most poetical passages. Gomez Arcecho read at the Academy of History an excellent study on Alvarez and the defence of Gerona against the French, and Moreno Nieto an exhaustive linguistic essay at the inauguration of the Ateneo.

The first volume has appeared of the 'Historia de los Heterodoxos Españoles,' by M. Pelayo. The subject has often been treated before, but never in so exhaustive a manner, the principal object being to illustrate the doctrines of Francisco de Encinas, Valdés, and other Spanish reformers. In the present volumes Pelayo begins his study from the earliest times, previous to Priscillianus, and continues it through the Middle Ages. Besides describing the leading events of the Albigenses, Waldenses, and other sectarians, the author has collected valuable information concerning the heterodox personages of any importance who were connected with sects in Italy, Germany, and France. Pelayo writes from a strictly Roman Catholic point of view; he confesses that he is "partial in principle, but impartial and true when describing facts," and sums up his observations by remarking that Spanish intellect is eminently Roman Catholic, and heterodoxy in Spain only produced a passing flash. Pelayo has also written in the course of the year a number of interesting studies in different periodicals on various subjects. 'Historia del Renacimiento Literario Contemporaneo en Cataluña, Baleares, y Valencia' appears at a moment when a most remarkable revival has taken place in the study of the Catalan dialect. This movement began with a review which appeared in 1843 at Barcelona, giving an impulse to these studies; since then a great number of most creditable works have appeared in Catalan, so many, in fact, as to produce a renaissance of this dialect.

JUAN F. RIAÑO.

SWEDEN.

THE representatives of the free press of Sweden celebrated on the 6th of December the fiftieth birthday of the important newspaper Aftonbladet. In honour of this occasion there appeared a biography of the founder of Aftonbladet, L. J. Hierta, issued at the expense of his successor in his publishing business, Mr. Hjalmar Linnström, and written by H. Wisselgren. With indefatigable ardour and unflinching perseverance, Hierta, from early youth until his health was broken by age, struggled to make our fundamental laws, acquired by the revolution of 1809, a reality in our national life, and to introduce institutions that would form a truer expression of the wants and desires of the people as distinguished from the officials than the ancient representative system. He died, surrounded by public and general esteem, in 1872.

About the same time as Hierta founded Aftonbladet, another of our most celebrated journalists, M. J. Crusenstolpe, started for the service of the Government Fäderneslandet (The Fatherland), but it failed to gain the sympathy of the public. After rather a short existence it ceased to appear, and Crusenstolpe devoted all his after life to making war on the system of government and the dynasty at whose disposal he had formerly placed his eminent talents as a writer. At last he found himself within the precincts of the fortress of Waxholm upon a charge of high treason, and there he had to stay for three years, but even in his prison he continued his caustic attacks. A circumstantial account of the life and doings of this man has lately been published by the writer of these lines, who has partly relied on hitherto unknown collections of records, that have further supplied him with materials for another biographical work, viz., 'Ur Svenska Hofvets och Aristokratiens Lif' ('From the Life of the Swedish Court and Aristocracy'), of which two parts have appeared during the course of the current year. To modern history also belong 'Skildringar ur det Offentliga Lifvet' ('Pictures from Public Life'), by the ex-Counsellor of State O. H. Fähræus, and 'Berättelser ur C. O. Palmstiernas Lefnad' ('Narratives from the Life of C. O. Palmstierna'). The productive author P. O. Backström has traced the history of Charles XIV. Johan in a volume of the large popular work commenced by C. G. Starbäck, which is to be continued until the present time. And. Fryxell has recently concluded his gigantic enterprise, 'Berättelser ur Svenska Historien' ('Tales from Swedish History'), the last volume of which ends with the years immediately preceding Gustave III.'s accession to the throne. Further I ought to mention that the extensive illustrated work entitled 'Sveriges Historia från äldsta Dagar till närvarande Tid,' by Montelius, Alin, Weibull, and several other writers, is still in progress, and that H. Hildebrand has published the first part of a great work connected with the history of culture in Sweden during the Middle Ages. A descriptive account of the Swedish capital in ancient times, entitled 'Gamla Stockholm,' published by Claes Lundin and August Strindberg, is readable and full of varied information, and is adorned with excellent engravings. Among the most conspicuous illustrated works are 'Ragnar Lodbroks Saga' ('The Tale of Ragnar Lodbrok'), told by P. A. Güdecke, and illustrated by August Malmström, and 'Dödens Engel' ('The Angel of Death'), by Wallin, illustrated by Carl Larsson.

A prominent place is occupied by 'Winterqvallar' ('Winter Nights'), stories and tales by Z. Topelius, since the death of Runeberg Finland's most celebrated author. His publisher has also undertaken a series of original novelettes, such, for instance, as a volume containing selected stories by "Lea" (Mrs. Wettergrund), for several years past a popular author; a novel entitled 'Skatteökaren' ('The Searcher for Hidden Treasures'), by the gifted young Georg Nordensvan; some lively sketches entitled 'Ur Naturen och Samhället' ('Pictures drawn from Nature and Society'), by A. G. Santesson; 'Figurer och Händelser' ('Figures and Events'), by Axel Krook; and, besides, several little volumes, of which a romantic picture of the rural life in the province of Halland, by August Bondeosson, deserves particular praise. He is a new author and promising. Hitherto our literature has been without a teller of tales and painter of popular life such as Asbjørnsen in Norway. The life in our northern provinces, especially the sad existence of the Laps, has this year, as well as in a preceding small volume, been treated with freshness and truth to nature by "Gubben Noach" in his 'Skogvaktarens Berättelser' ('Tales of a Gamekeeper').

The special literature created by Dr. Nordenskiöld's successful expedition, so creditable to my nation, is too extensive to notice in detail. Suffice it to say that the first volume of the famous discoverer's own account of his voyage has now appeared, 'Vegas Färd kring Europa och Asien,' abundantly provided with illustrations, maps, and steel engravings. As you have announced, translations will appear in all the chief languages of Europe.

A young native of Upsala, K. Wicksell, has taken it into his head to adapt the doctrines of Malthus to our state of things in a volume entitled 'Samhälls Olyckornas Vigtigaste Orsaker och Botemedel' ('The Principal Causes of Social Calamities and their Remedies'). Hereupon followed a great many polemical and apologetic writings, among them a critique by Hammar-skjöld, a Counsellor of State, and some observations by P. Wikner.

At Upsala there has also appeared a rather interesting book by Prof. Rudin, entitled 'Sören Kierkegaards Person och Författarskap' ('Sören Kierkegaard's Person and Authorship'). It is directed against the celebrated Danish author Georg Brandes's treatise on the same subject, but is somewhat partial and uncritical. If Dr. Brandes has handled Kierkegaard with too little sympathy for his religious opinions, Prof. Rudin, on the contrary, places him on a pedestal so high that he disappears above the skies. Rudin is a disciple of Kierkegaard, and he shows rather too much anxiety "jurare in verba magistri." The book is, however, lively and well written. I must also notice a manual of the literary annals of Sweden from ancient to modern times by Karl Warburg. A work of particular importance for historical investigators is an account of the collections of Swedish letters belonging to the manuscript department of the Royal Library, compiled by Elof Tegnér.

In poetry the most conspicuous place is occupied by a small volume of new poems by C. D. af Wirsén, and a collection of new and old lyrical pieces by Emil von Qvanten. The drama has, as is usually the case with us, this year also been of little importance. The sole piece worthy of mentioning is 'Gillet Hemlighet' ('The Secret of the Corporation'), a comedy by Aug. Strindberg, the author whose success in his 'Röda Rummet' ('The Red Chamber') I mentioned last year. He has now also commenced to publish a collection of his earlier poems and stories under the common title 'I Vårbrytningen' ('In the Dawn of Spring').

A couple of our most distinguished prose writers, Viktor Rydberg and A. Hedin, have also this year enriched our literature. The book of Viktor Rydberg is of a theological character, a learned and fervent treatise on the doctrines of the Last Judgment and the things to follow, a new appendix to his celebrated work 'Bibels Lära om Kristus' ('What the Bible teaches about Christ'). Hedin has concluded his work entitled 'Franska Revolutionens Qvinnor' ('The Women of the French Revolution'), and has besides published a pamphlet entitled 'Allman Vär-negligt och fritt Samhällsskick' ('On the Duty of General National Defence'), in which he states how the idea of this duty has arisen and gained ground in opposition to the monopolizing trade of arms.

The history of fine arts has this year been comparatively barren. One of our poets, F. Zander, has written a small volume entitled 'Francesco Piranesi, Svensk Konstagent och Minister i Rom' ('Francesco Piranesi, Swedish Art Agent and Minister at Rome'). As a curiosity, it may be mentioned that one of our most distinguished artists, Georg von Rosen, has recently made his début as an author, having in a somewhat fantastical form presented the religious impressions he derived from a sojourn in Palestine. This essay has appeared in the 'Literary Album,' a collection of tales and poems accompanied by portraits of the authors. For the rest the so-called Christmas literature is very abundant—too abundant, in fact, to be dealt with in a brief article like this.

LITERATURE

A History of Modern Europe. By C. A. Fyffe, M.A.—Vol. I. From the Outbreak of the Revolutionary War in 1792 to the Accession of Louis XVIII. in 1814. (Cassell & Co.)

THE first inquiry that should be made about a new work on an historical subject is whether the author has opened new sources of information, or, if not, whether by a closer examination of the facts already known he has been led to new conclusions. In either way he may perform the proper and principal function of an historian, which is to increase our knowledge of the events which have happened in the world.

It is obvious at a glance that Mr. Fyffe makes no pretension to do anything of the kind. He has consulted no new documents, he has drawn solely from the most accessible sources, and he has found there nothing but what might have been expected. In his preface he says not a word about any authorities, and he only very rarely in the course of his narrative condescends to tell whence his information is derived. The book leaves the pleasing impression that there is nothing of the sceptic about Mr. Fyffe; his mind seems to have been agitated by no uneasy suspicions concerning the basis on which history rests. At least we gather this from his absolute silence on the subject, for we think he could hardly have forgotten to tell us of it if he had ever felt any difficulty or undergone any struggles in arriving at his conclusions. It is, perhaps, a natural consequence of the ease with which they have been reached that the conclusions themselves have in no case anything very remarkable about them. They are, in fact, almost invariably adopted from other writers, and Mr. Fyffe has reserved to himself only the task of ascertaining that the writers on whom he depends are in good repute, and then the task of clothing their decisions in clear and decorous language.

In saying that the book is a compilation we have no intention of disparaging it. It does not profess to be more, and nine-tenths of the historical works published are, and must be, compilations. We only think it necessary to mark the fact with some distinctness because the unpractised reader may easily overlook it. To the general public histories differ from each other only as they are amusing or heavy, because the general public has scarcely any conception of the process by which a history is made. Any work on an historical subject, therefore, if only it is of goodly bulk and written in a stately style, will pass as a work of the same order as those of Gibbon and Grote, though essentially it may resemble them only as some cardboard temple on the stage resembles the massive and spacious fabric of the architect. In no other department of literature does there exist a distinction so radical which is at the same time so wholly inappreciable by the ordinary reader.

But though the best historical compilation is a slight and trivial work compared with the humblest history which truly deserves the name, yet some historical compilations are much better than others, and some are very useful. There must be the shop for distribution and display as well as the factory, and, indeed, the ordinary customer will rarely look further than the shop. Mr. Fyffe's book is a handsome suite of rooms in which the productions of the great historical factories are exhibited to the best advantage. His enterprise will be justified if it can be shown that such an exhibition was needed, that the objects of exhibition have been well selected, and that they really are advantageously displayed.

His plan is to regard the disturbances of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods from the European point of view, and he starts from the principle that "the outbreak of the Revolutionary War in 1792, terminating a period which now appears far removed from us, and setting in motion forces which have in our own day produced a united Germany and a united Italy, forms the natural starting-point of a history of the present century." The volume now published embraces the period 1792-1814; it is to be followed by a second, which is to "bring the reader down to the year 1848," and a third, which will bring him to the present time. The meaning of this is that, as historical compilation must always keep pace with history proper, it has appeared to Mr. Fyffe that the time is come when the new results of historical investigators in this period should be reported to the general public in a new popular narrative. Such books as those of Taine and Von Sybel on the Revolution, of Lanfrey on Napoleon, and the mass of German investigation which has been sifted and brought before the English public by Mr. Seeley, have placed the whole period in a new light, and it is time that the new knowledge thus gained should be put within the reach of all.

It is fortunate when a task of this kind, which could be performed in some fashion by almost anybody, falls into the hands of a man of real cultivation. Mr. Fyffe not only reads French, Italian, and a little German, but writes English with clearness, correctness, and even elegance. He has composed an agreeable narrative, which can be understood without the slightest effort, and yet does sufficiently convey the information it promises. This is something. Nevertheless, without passing beyond the limits of intelligent compilation, Mr. Fyffe might have done more. On a subject so great, and hitherto so inadequately treated, much light might have been thrown by mere arrangement, combination, and firm impartiality, even without original research. The French Revolution, the wars which arose out of it, the transformation of Europe which it caused, are subjects upon which the English public has still everything to learn. We began by looking at them from a purely English point of view, and then, as they were superseded by newer changes, we rather ceased to look at them at all than began to look at them without prejudice. The English view gave place not to an impartial view, but rather to a faint recollection of the French view.

It has been a great misfortune that English Liberalism in the last generation should, without the least necessity, have adopted so freely the popular legend of the Revolution and of Napoleon that has grown up in France. A firm distinction ought to have been drawn from the beginning between the Revolution of 1789 and the second Revolution (wholly distinct, and including the whole Napoleonic drama) of 1792. We ought to have adhered resolutely to the first, in spite of its occasional acts of enormous rashness, but we ought to have resisted not less firmly all the seductions of the poets, novelists, and party orators who strove to win our sympathy for the second. Now English Liberalism unfortunately committed itself to the bad morality, the bastard poetry, and the false history of the apologists of 1792. Hence it has been obliged to make a series of recantations as the new investigations refuted one after another the positions of Jacobinism, and at the present moment the language of English Liberalism on the whole subject of the French Revolution is not a little embarrassed and confused. Mr. Fyffe has not shaken himself free from this confusion. He handles the subject rather in a fair and reasonable than in a vigorous manner. Accordingly, while he notes carefully and accepts caudally all that is urged against the Jacobinical theory, he has not the resolution to break with that theory altogether, and to recognize that the Liberal party, though they were quite right in sympathizing with the Revolution at the outset, ought to have perceived that a wholly new departure was made in 1792, and that a movement commenced then with which Liberalism could have no sympathy. He accepts in the main all that has been urged by De Tocqueville, Léonce de Lavergne, Taine, Von Sybel, Mortimer-Ternaux, and Lanfrey, and yet we are every now and then surprised by some judgment which is a mere survival from the Sturm-und-Drang period of opinion about the Revolution. Thus, after describing with perfect candour the frightful condition of France in the latter part of 1793, and after quoting with approval the dictum of Burke, that French society consisted at that time "but of two descriptions, the oppressors and the oppressed," he passes, without the slightest warning, from the language of good sense into the wildest strain of Jacobinism, and declares that in which a few enjoy every earthly good, while the many have little more than suffice for their animal needs; nor was life sacrificed more freely to a political ideal than at a later period it has been sacrificed to dangerous and unwholesome industries which enrich the capitalist."

It is curious to remark how easily our writers fall into a French way of thinking when they write on a French subject. Such a judgment as this, if it had not referred to French affairs, would almost have made his readers doubt Mr. Fyffe's sanity; as it is, we perceive at once that he has been keeping wild company and that his style has been for the moment tainted by it. Here is another specimen of a similar bewilderment:—

"The new civil constitution of the clergy, which was voted by the National Assembly in 1790, transformed the priesthood from a society of landowners into a body of salaried officers of the State, and gave to the laity the election of their bishops and ministers. The change, though a just, was not a wise one, for it threw the whole body of bishops and a great part of the lower clergy into revolt."

This judgment is apparently intended to be in the spirit of a moderate Liberalism, but it betrays an incredible confusion of ideas. Mr. Fyffe not only approves of a system of parliamentary religion much more thoroughgoing than that of the Anglican Establishment, but in expressing his approval seems carefully to select the words which may most distinctly express his opinion that religion ought to be simply an affair of Government. This uncompromising declaration, which Mr. Fyffe makes with perfect equanimity, amazes us so much that we forget to be surprised at the mildness of the epithet in which he censures the act of the National Assembly. We are so astonished at hearing it described as just that we forget to laugh when we are told that it was not wise. The truth is that Mr. Fyffe abandons himself to the guidance of his French authorities. If he would for a moment use his English common sense, he would see the grotesqueness of applying such an epithet to that portentous act of infatuation which darkened the history of Europe for twenty years. But we see plainly by these examples the limit of Mr. Fyffe's faculty. He has read and understood a fair number of books in two or three languages; he can reproduce their contents in good style and with clear arrangement; but his mind does not work with any vigour upon these materials; he has no independent historical judgment.

At p. 99 Mr. Fyffe makes an attempt at original historical reflection when he undertakes to tell his readers "what was new to Europe in the Revolution." The reforms proposed were not new; they had been anticipated by Joseph in Austria and Leopold in Tuscany; what was new was that in France "the nation itself acted," "in France reform started with the Declaration of the Rights of Man, and aimed at the creation of local authority to be exercised by the citizens themselves." The reflection is just as applied to the movement of 1789, but Mr. Fyffe inserts it under the year 1795. Under this date he ought certainly to have added that in 1792 France abandoned this system, returned to violently despotic methods, abolished local liberties, and so ended by working out her problem in much the same way as it had been worked out in Austria and Hungary, Napoleon playing the part of Joseph and Leopold.

The traditional tone of Liberalism which Mr. Fyffe adopts is as recklessly harsh towards the European sovereigns as it is recklessly partial to the Revolution. It might be excusable thirty years ago to speak as if every act of Prussia and Austria was of the same nature as the partition of Poland. Those powers had really been guilty of great crimes, and then we had so little information about them that we could not avoid speaking somewhat at random. But if we are now to make a serious attempt to understand the Continent, we must begin by abandoning the practice of speaking of its sovereigns as crowned robbers, to be associated with whom is a disgrace to the spotless purity of English ministers. Mr. Fyffe's account of the First Coalition is too much in this tone: "It was not the first instance shown in the war of a readiness to fight at other people's expense." In the supposed cause of Europe why was it unjustifiable that one power should find troops and another find money? "The King of Prussia now took up the part of the sturdy beggar." The mistake of the King of Prussia was of the opposite kind; it consisted in a thoughtless chivalry which necessarily landed so poor a state as Prussia in financial embarrassment. Mr. Fyffe can hardly have read the statement of the case given by Ranke in his 'Life of Hardenberg.' He has preferred to accept, in defiance of all the rules of evidence, the wild invective of Lord Malmesbury as if it were impartial testimony.

In short, beyond clearness and amenity of style, there is not much to commend in this book. For students it must be useless, for the simple reason that it gives no account of the authorities. There was room for a handbook of this period, which, without aiming at original research, might have been most useful. Such a handbook would have given a bare condensed narrative and a copious list of references. Mr. Fyffe has pursued the opposite course. He has told a pleasant tale, but when his readers ask where he obtained his information, he remains mysteriously silent, and leaves them to conjecture that he received it, as some theologians consider that St. Paul received his knowledge of the Gospel history, by direct revelation. For whom, then, is the book intended, since it is neither an original history nor a student's manual? It is, in fact, one of those numberless historical compendiums with which we have lately been overwhelmed, which undertake to put busy or lazy people in possession of historical results without troubling them with historical processes. All such books assume that the reader will not be too particular. To interrupt Mr. Fyffe, to ask him questions, is simply not fair. Sceptics, students, must go elsewhere. He is like a showman employed to explain some panorama or similar exhibition to the holiday crowd. He undertakes to tell a clear tale, and he does it; but he undertakes nothing more.

It is impossible to deny that such books ought to be written, and that they are almost indispensable. The knowledge they impart must somehow be acquired; and to acquire it in a satisfactory way most persons have not time. They must therefore employ the historical showman, and they are fortunate when they meet with one who, like Mr. Fyfe, can tell his tale grammatically and with good taste. Only let them not make the grave error of supposing that they have found a royal road to history, or that what they acquire deserves to be called knowledge. Let them also remark that the showman is a more dangerous authority on some periods than on others. Where great historians have been at work, where the facts have been fully ascertained and lifted out of the cloudy region of controversy into the sky of science, there the showman can do no harm; there his tale is likely, so far as it goes, to be perfectly trustworthy. Mr. Fyfe has chosen a period which is not of this kind, a period which is still clouded by angry controversy, and about which, in England at least, there is as yet scarcely any approach to agreement. On such a period the language of the showman is likely to be confused and misleading; however demure his tone and well chosen his expressions, he is likely at times from mere bewilderment to say singular things.

Whom did She Love? By Adair. (Same publishers.)

MR. NORRIS'S new novel is a great improvement upon 'Middlemarch.' It is a pleasant story, cheerfully and cleverly told, and containing some really fresh and spirited studies of character and manners. The scene of 'Matrimony' is laid partly in Paris and partly at the well-known sea-side town of Beachborough, and the person ostensibly responsible for it is a certain Mr. Knowles, an amiable middle-aged bachelor, with a good deal of quiet humour, an eye for character, not a little insight into certain parts of human nature, a serviceable knowledge of society, a knack of apt and sprightly dialogue, and an agreeably equable brightness of style. Its nominal hero is a handsome lad named Claud Gervis, who marries unwisely, and takes to the production of successful literature in two languages. The real hero, however, is Claud Gervis's father, a queer old expatriate, with a turn for spiteful speeches and generous actions. He appears to be a sketch from the life; he is interesting in every way; and Mr. Norris is heartily to be congratulated on the success with which he has contrived, without exaggeration of any kind, to depict his peculiarities of mind and heart, and of speech and manner and temper. Of less interest than Mr. Gervis himself, but still lifelike and attractive, is the figure of Mr. Gervis's daughter Genevieve. Grouped about these three chief personages are some half-dozen others of less moment—the pompous old noodle Mr. Fleming and his unpleasant and unprofitable daughter Nina; two capital old women,

Mrs. Knowles and Lady Croft; an amusing Russian, the Princess Ouranoff; an original and striking Polish conspirator, Mr. Hirsch; a fairly good jeune premier, Sir Frederick Croft,—all well and carefully drawn, and instinct, in greater or less degree, with life and reality. As for the supernumeraries, they include a Russian general, a half-pay admiral, an Anglo-Indian, a British governess, a long-shore mariner or two, and a successful French playwright, and are often as amusing as their principals. The plot and incidents of 'Matrimony' are hardly of equal value with the characters, but it is excellent reading for all that, and marks on the part of the author a great and decided advance in his art.

MISS WEECHÉ'S book narrates the slow but finally successful struggle undergone by a man who has to win anew the affections of his wife. Mr. Jack Melville has forgotten the adage which advises a man to be off with the old love before he is on with the new; and the day before his marriage his wife overhears him confessing his undying attachment to another woman. She at once resolves to consider herself only bound by the law, and to be his wife to the outside world alone. The process of reunion is somewhat too long, though the story turns out better than we anticipated from the opening chapters. There is a long voyage and a shipwreck, and the result is domestic happiness and the complete defeat of the schemes of the immodest Emeline. A Welsh maidservant bears a prominent part in the story, not justified by much merit in her character.

MRS. SIMPSON'S Geraldine had unnecessary trouble with her suitors. It is hard upon her to be so persistently wooed by a man she dislikes, but she deserves some punishment for the facility with which she promises her unpleasant suitor that she will never marry any one else. A more unnatural situation than that in which she places herself by her gratuitous folly has seldom been imagined even by a lady novelist. Fortunately when a cheerful soldier, endowed with some common sense, comes upon the scene, he very promptly shows at how cheap a rate he holds the nudum pactum with which Geraldine has been frightening her conscience. In spite of the high pitch to which the author endeavours to work our feelings, it is impossible to feel serious sympathy with the heroine and her friends. Colonel Wyvern's fall from the cliff to a convenient ledge is worthy of a scene in a burlesque.

The minister's daughters are most unfortunate in their marriages, one marrying a somewhat elderly nobleman and revenging herself upon him by compromising flirtations, the other marrying for love an ardent adorer who has the one defect of an existing wife. The story of their different troubles is told with some terre and uncompromising plainness; but we cannot consider it altogether agreeable reading. It is perhaps the less so for a suspicion of polemical purpose, the mistakes of the girls being attributed to the neglect of the "minister's" wife, an exaggerated sketch of a narrow-minded Presbyterian. There is some consolation, however, in the fact that the heroines come safely through their troubles, the unhappy Mrs. Messiter dying in time to make way for Clara, and poor Lord George eventually gaining the affections of his flighty and unprincipled wife.

'Whom did She Love?' is a first, and it must be hoped a last, attempt in fiction. Its subject and its incidents, without a single exception, are so unpleasant that it is hard to understand the reason for putting them into print; and there is nothing in the manner of relation which can redeem the character of the story. The kindest advice which can be given to the author is that he should look upon this effort as a failure, and write, if he ever writes again, on an entirely different model.

Adventures of Working Men. By G. Manville Fenn. (Cassell & Co.)

Peter Parley's Annual for 1881. (Ben George.)

LADY BARKER'S little book will thoroughly amuse little readers, and is suitable for reading aloud. The Zulu stories are as good as the others; but it is hardly fair to instil opinions on debatable political points in the course of a nursery tale.

The only drawback to 'Adventures in the Far West' is that the volume is flimsily bound. It deserves a stout covering, as it will be well thumbed by all boys who delight in trappers of unerring aim and marvellous persistence, Indians who ride habitually on the sides of their horses, and in that position never fail to bring down the wary bison or hated paleface, and all the mixture of slang chivalry and rough adventure characteristic of this school of authorship.

MISS AUSTIN'S story of two little girls and their reading of the command to "love one's neighbour" is pretty and quaint. She does not fall into the common mistake of instilling precocious notions of love into childish minds, though, on the other hand, the dialogue is perhaps more infantile than children like. We must protest, too, against such a name as "Shadie" Cottage. When will English people return to the proper spelling of an English termination, instead of borrowing the Scotch diminutive, which they cannot pronounce?

'A Christmas Child' contains a few capital but very slight designs on wood, which are marked with taste, although they have been easily drawn and roughly cut. We submitted the book to a critic of twelve years old, whom long experience in such matters had qualified. He, after his kind, "bolted" it at one sitting, and stopped not till he came to the end. The pitifulness of the catastrophe made him cry, until he declared that the rest was "stunning"; but the last chapter "ought never to have been written, because it made him miserable."

'A Six Years' Darling; or, Trix in Town,' is a nice little story of innocent and lively incidents, referring to children with spirit and tact and just feeling for childhood.

'Nobody's Lad' is an extremely pathetic story of a poor street boy, who falls into the hands of a sort of Fagin, who claims to be his uncle, and from whom the benevolent Norman Stanfield is unable to rescue him. Tim escapes only to die, but he does not sacrifice the principle of honesty which he has somehow picked up from the only people who ever showed him kindness. It is a story which at the present season may suggest to children in happier circumstances a timely thought of the unfortunate.

'Marion Scatterthwaite' raises hopes which are not quite realised. The story begins well, and there is a good deal of artistic feeling in the description of Marion's country house and surroundings; yet one feels that the author really knows little of the country. Fancy an old family mansion with its name on the gate, to be altered by means of a paintpot and brush! Further on the history of Marion's daily work at South Kensington is told at great length, and is only relieved by a misunderstanding with her lover more unnecessary even than those which usually occur in story books. "Coral became incultured with my spirit of wickedness" is less careful English than the author can write.

'Ethel's Adventures in Doll Country' are a very pale and feeble reflection of Alice's experiences in Wonderland. The tale will meet the tastes, perhaps, of very little girls, and the pictures will appeal to a larger circle of the infant public.

Mr. Penn professes to have a practical knowledge of the labouring classes: "The result of my experience is that your genuine working man, if he has been unspoiled by publicans and those sinners the demagogues, who are always putting false notions into his head, is a thoroughly sterling individual. That is the rule—I need not quote the exceptions, for there are black sheep enough among them, even as there are among other classes. Take him all in all, the British workman is a being of whom we may well be proud, and the better he is treated the brighter the colours in which he will come out." Mr. Penn gives twenty-three tales illustrative of a physician's experience amongst working men. Some of the stories are interesting; most of them are well told.

Peter Parley, in this the fortieth year of publication, fully maintains his character. His matter, all original, is good, the fiction is interesting, the facts are instructive, and the illustrations are well executed.

THE LITERATURE OF ECONOMIC SCIENCE.

The Irish Land Laws. By Alexander G. Richey, Q.C. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE object of Mr. Richey's treatise is to lay before the public in a brief and popular form the leading principles of the existing Irish land law, to show how it has grown to be what it is, how it differs from that existing in England, and to draw attention to the points in which the Irish law and the Roman and French law on the subject resemble or differ from each other. Mr. Richey's explanation of the origin of the English rule that anything annexed to the premises became a fixture and part of the freehold, which a tenant would be guilty of waste in removing, though added to the premises by himself, will be new even to many learned readers. The English rule respecting fixtures had not its origin in any feudal custom. It was imported into English from Roman law by Bracton, whose incomplete statement of the rule of Roman law rendered the English law on the subject peculiarly inequitable. The most interesting and important chapters of Mr. Richey's work are those on Mr. Cardwell's Landlord and Tenant Act of 1860 and Mr. Gladstone's Act of 1870. The object of Mr. Cardwell's Act was to make the relation between landlord and tenant one simply of contract. The economic maxim of laissez faire was then in the ascendant, and the Act of 1860 treated the rights and obligations of both parties as determined strictly by the convention between them. Mr. Richey's treatise is not controversial, yet he plainly indicates an opinion that Irish society had not reached a stage adapted to such a land law. The tenants in general were without other means of livelihood, and could not be said to enter into a free contract, and they had in many cases reclaimed land on the assumption that they would be allowed to remain its occupants, at, it may be, a higher rent, but still as having a property in their improvements. The Act of 1870, in Mr. Richey's view, halted between two extremes. It did not openly set aside the principle of the Act of 1860, that the relation between landlord and tenant was one of contract, yet, on the other hand, it circuitously gave the tenant an interest in his holding which was not in the bond. "The framers of the Act dared not to state openly that the object of the statute was to give the tenant any estate in the land. The Act, therefore, apparently gave the tenant no new rights, nor deprived the landlord of any, but attempted to effect its object in a circuitous manner by affixing a penalty to the exercise of rights which it admitted to be legal." The consequence is a state of things unsatisfactory to landlord, to tenants, and to the judge who has to arbitrate between them. The framers of a new Landlord and Tenant Act for Ireland will do well to consider carefully Mr. Richey's criticism on the Act of 1870, and the queries which he submits to any one undertaking to construct a statute on the subject. The first of these queries is, "Whether or not it must be admitted that the doctrines of the political economists as to free trade in land, when applied to the relations of the Irish landlord and tenant, have proved inapplicable, if not actually mischievous, so that every approximation to the civil or French law is discovered to be injurious to the condition of the peasantry and the peace of the country; and, if so, whether, having regard to the future of the country, it is expedient to reform our laws so as to assimilate them to those in use among nations of an inferior social development." Mr. Richey's treatise is opportune, learned, and useful. Some of the remarks in the appendix appear hypercritical, and to some extent based on a misunderstanding of a well-known writer on whose works he comments.

The Parliamentary History of the Irish Land Question and the Origin and Results of the Ulster Custom. By R. Barry O'Brien. (Bamson Low & Co.)

THE parliamentary history of the Irish land question involves much of its general history, the legislation and efforts at legislation of successive statesmen having been based on the actual situation of matters in Ireland resulting from the chain of events. Mr. O'Brien's book thus contains more than a reader, thinking only of parliamentary proceedings, might anticipate. It lies out of our province to pronounce an opinion on Mr. O'Brien's view of the Land Act of 1870, as having failed to protect the tenant sufficiently because it leaves to the landlord the power to raise the rent "capriciously." We do not gather what Mr. O'Brien's own opinion is with respect to the power of tenants to sublet at the best rent. Supposing the present landlords' rent to be fixed by Act of Parliament, and the tenant to get fixity of tenure and free sale, the value of land will nevertheless rise or fall. An outgoing tenant who sold his interest outright would get the benefit of a rise in the price paid by the incoming. Is he to be debarred from getting it in another shape, by letting the farm at a higher rent? If not, how is the old state of things prevented from recurring? No certain history exists of the origin of the so-called "Ulster custom" of tenant right, and Mr. O'Brien candidly admits that his own view is in good part speculative. It has been supposed by several writers to have originated in native customs anterior to James I.'s Ulster Plantation, but Mr. O'Brien rejects this supposition. He likewise dismises as untenable the view that the custom was directly established by the Plantation scheme. Neither Sir Arthur Chichester nor Sir John Davies, he says, contemplated either the establishment or the subsequent growth of any usage akin to the Ulster custom. "What both sought to, and did in a certain measure, establish was fixity of tenure." But this alone is not the Ulster custom." According to Mr. O'Brien, the Ulster custom probably grew out of transactions between the English tenants of the Plantation and the Scotch. The English, discontented at their treatment by the landlords, parted in many cases with their holdings to the Scotch, and thus the custom of the sale of his interest or tenant right by the outgoing to the incoming tenant originated. Mr. O'Brien makes no reference to the different account of the origin of the custom put forward twelve years ago by Lord Dufferin. North and south, and not in Ulster alone, it was the custom of landlords in Ireland formerly to grant long leases for three lives or sixty-one years, and the tenants dealt with the leasehold accordingly when the value of land rose. And in Ulster, where a solidarity of interest between landlord and tenant existed, the landlords seldom raised the rents when such long leases expired, and thus the tenant got practically on some estates a valuable interest to dispose of. The custom was not, however, universally recognized, and Lord Dufferin denies altogether its existence in the middle of the eighteenth century, regarding it as of modern growth. What is quite certain is that, however the germ of the custom originated, it received its various shapes on different Ulster estates from the landlords and their agents.

The Irrigation Works of India, and their Financial Results. By Robert B. Buckley. (Allen & Co.)

"THERE exists at present," Mr. Buckley remarks with perfect justice, "no book which gives any comprehensive account of the irrigation works of India." This statement is not supported by mere negative evidence alone. It is only necessary to turn to the thirty-six pages given to the subject in Mr. Thornton's 'Indian Public Works' to see how very inadequate is the information which is accessible to the English reader. As to the importance of the irrigation works, which possibly has been overestimated by certain zealous advocates, it is certain that there are few matters affecting the welfare of an area of more than two millions of superficial miles more deserving of profound and exhaustive study. Even apart from the question of the industrial value to India herself of the best system of irrigation attainable in different parts of the country, there is, from the point of view of the English capitalist, great need for full information as to the value of irrigation works as an investment. To take the enterprise of the Madras Irrigation Company as an instance, it is a fact that intending and even actual investors in this work have found it to be a matter of the utmost difficulty to obtain any thorough and trustworthy information about the actual value of the undertaking. Without going into more detail than can be comprised in a volume of two hundred pages, Mr. Buckley has compiled, chiefly from Government Reports and official papers, a systematic account of the general outline of the Indian irrigation works. The map prefixed to the volume is, we may remark, a reproduction of the fourth map in the 'Statement exhibiting the Moral and Material Progress of India during the Year 1872-1873,' with the addition in the margin of a list of the irrigation canals. After an introductory chapter, which concludes by a statement of rainfall in different tracts of India, taken from the 'Report of the Select Committee on Indian Public Works, 1879,' Mr. Buckley describes in six successive chapters the irrigation works of the Madras presidency, Bombay, Sind, Bengal, the North-West Provinces, and the Punjab. He concludes by a temperate and able chapter on the financial results, and the tests of the utility of irrigation works. According to a report from Major-General Dickens, by the year 1876-76 the total expenditure on productive irrigation works in India had been 15,562,655*l.* On this sum the receipts allowed the annual payment of 700,000*l.* in interest at 4½ per cent., of 396,750*l.* as working expenses, and of a residual profit of 131,924*l.* This, however, is exclusive of the outlay on the works of the Madras Irrigation Company. The Select Committee of 1879 remark on this statement that the return is almost entirely due to some most successful works—those of Sind, the Ganges, the East and West Jumna, the Cauvery, the Godavery, and the Kistna. On these works 5,492,688*l.* had been spent, and the net receipts, after paying working expenses and interest, amounted to 555,771*l.*, yielding a total return of more than 14½ per cent. on the capital. Against this had to be set the expenditure of 10,069,967*l.*, on which receipts had done little more than pay working expenses alone, besides the loss of 46,453*l.* (as compared with 4½ per cent. interest) on the 1,372,000*l.* of the Madras Irrigation Company. On the other hand, it has to be borne in mind that the return from irrigation works is but slowly developed. And according to the Budget Estimate for 1880-81, while the direct receipts of all irrigation works amount to 680,000*l.*, the increase of land revenue due to irrigation works amounts to a further sum of 703,000*l.* "These figures show, perhaps as simply as any, the slow and steady progress which works of irrigation are making in India." Mr. Buckley has attempted a work which was much needed, and he has accomplished it well.

Political Economy for Business People. By Robert Jamieson. (Erfingham Wilson.)

THE author of this little book has put before his readers a theory of value and of prices which is so far new that it is contrary to the one established, as we think conclusively, by the older economists. Mr. Jamieson bases the whole merit of his work upon the section of it containing the exposition of his views upon money and value. Tried by this test he will be found wanting; but on other matters—such, for instance, as free trade, where he can free himself from his favourite doctrine—he writes clearly and forcibly, and with the advantage apparently of practical business experience of the topics with which he deals.

Trade, Population, and Food: a Series of Papers on Economic Statistics. By Stephen Bourne. (Bell & Sons.)

THERE is one characteristic defect in nearly all books composed of series of papers each one of which has been read by its author before an audience. As the end of the paper approaches the inevitable bit of eloquence in the peroration oppresses the nervous reader like a nightmare: however deep the author may be in the price of tallow and raw sugars on p. 100, the reader knows that he must work round to Christianity and civilization by p. 102. Mr. Bourne has no mercy in this respect; as surely as his paper draws near its end, the elements of which it is composed "shall dwindle, shall blend, shall change," like the soul's vision in Mr. Browning's poem 'Prospice'; the tables of exports and imports melt imperceptibly into Scriptural quotations and phrases that would not be out of place in a sermon or at a missionary meeting. This defect does not, however, detract from the substantial value of the book. Mr. Bourne's official experience has given him great facility in dealing with statistics, and many readers who hesitate to plunge into the 'Statistical Abstract' and the 'Statesman's Year-Book' will find "statistics made easy" in Mr. Bourne's pages. A good example of Mr. Bourne's careful and painstaking method of work will be found in the last chapter, in which he discusses the subject lately brought under public notice by Lord Carnarvon and Mr. Blackley of compulsory national insurance. Mr. Bourne examines the scheme in its practical financial aspects, and shows that a club formed under the conditions described by Mr. Blackley would be bankrupt within the lifetime of its first members. The difficulty of preventing fraud when the weekly allowance in sickness is provided by the State renders all calculations on the subject liable to err on the side favourable to Mr. Blackley's proposal; leaving this consideration aside, it must also be remembered that the actuarial calculations on which ordinary insurance companies and friendly societies act are based on the power which exists to reject bad lives and to charge extra premiums for doubtful lives. A compulsory insurance of the whole nation would necessarily offer terms much less advantageous to the insurers. The weak and sickly could not be rejected, and their maintenance would convert the proposed society into a gigantic system of out-door relief, without the guarantees which at present exist for its economical distribution.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

In Sword and Surplice; or, Thirty Years' Reminiscences of the Army and the Church: an Autobiography (Bogue). Mr. H. J. Wale has drawn what seems to be a lively presentment of himself, and, on the whole, he succeeds in interesting as well as amusing his readers. But he shows himself to be no master of the art of composing a book. It is not that he cannot write pleasantly; on the contrary, when he is writing about what he is best pleased to narrate his style is bright and lively, but his book as a whole is a medley not arranged in at all a happy disorder. Especially in his Indian reminiscences does Mr. Wale show a want of sense of proportion. He has many pleasant little anecdotes to tell, but he is wearisome when he devotes a whole chapter to the description of a ram-fight. Mr. Wale was born at Little Shelford, in a house well known to many a Cambridge man, and he describes the old house and his early childhood with an affection, a simplicity, and an amusing vivacity which at once put his readers upon good terms with him. His life in India is not so well done. He forgets possibly that India is better known to English people now than it was thirty or forty years ago. We hardly need to be told that tiffin means lunch, chum a bosom friend, and salaam a low bow; nor are such words as bungalow, compound, bund, and tank anything but perfectly familiar to English readers. How many officers would be glad if the equivalent which Mr. Wale gives for 600 rupees were only true at the present day! The chapters which contain the author's recollections of the Crimea are well worth reading, though Mr. Wale seems not to have been in action there. He tells us details which have not been so often supplied, and presents a vivid picture of the every-day life, with its discomforts, its suspense, and its common-places. He did not have much of it, however, for very soon after his arrival he was attacked with dysentery, and sent first to the hospital at Balaklava, then to Constantinople, and then home. While steaming up the Bosphorus he was well enough to be enchanted, as everybody is, with the scenery, and made some remark about it to a fellow passenger, who was a very practical man. "What a rascally shame it is," said Mr. S., "these Turks should have it." "Well, but," said I, "Mr. S., it belongs to them."—"Don't care, sir," responded he, "I should take it away from them." "But what would you do with it, then?" asked I.—"Do with it, sir? Why, I should give it to a joint-stock company, make a watering-place of it, and light it with gas." That perhaps would not be a bad solution of the Eastern Question. When this Mr. S. arrived at the hotel at Constantinople, the first thing he did "was to walk up to the chimney-piece and stick a large card, considerably larger than a lady's visiting card, into the glass, the said card bearing the inscription in equally large print:

'Mr. — of London.' And when he was told the price of otto roses at a bazaar, he said, "Tell the scoundrel we can do them ourselves at half the price." Mr. Wale's account of his transition from soldier to parson is not given with so much point as some of his earlier reminiscences, and from this period his story declines in interest, a falling off which is made more noticeable by a newly acquired tendency to sermonizing. Indeed, he sets out at length a large portion of a funeral sermon preached by himself. One little story of his curate days may be given: "D— S— was always glad to see the curate, and I on my part endeavoured to 'put in a word in due season.' So one day, after an ordinary introductory conversation, I said to her, 'Well, Mrs. D—, I have not seen you at church lately.' 'No, that you ain't,' answered she. 'In fact,' continued I, 'I do not remember ever having seen you at church at all.' Upon this she came up to me and gave me a slap on the back, and, said she, 'There, don't you bother yourself about church, do you see? We bain't no turncoats, we bain't; if we don't go to church we don't go to chapel!'" The story of the old man who always read the "Churching of Women," because it was so comforting, though doubtless true, is not quite new. Mr. Wale concludes his book with some papers on various subjects, such as middle-class education and temperance, which he would have done better to omit.

We have a number of almanacs on our table. Of these the most noted and most popular is Whitaker's Almanac (Whitaker). Among the improvements introduced are "The English Citizen's Diary," an excellent idea; and a list of hoods, which will appease, perhaps, the curiosity of churchgoers. The whole almanac is to be reset, a proceeding characteristic of the energetic editor. The other almanacs are of a more special character. The Farmers' and Country Gentlemen's Almanac ('Farmer' Office), edited by Mr. Kains-Jackson, has a prosperous air, as if there were no such thing as agricultural distress. Might not the accounts of the crops of the year be made a little more elaborate with advantage? Surely in these days "the foreign harvest" needs more than a dozen lines.—The Gardener's Year-Book ('Journal of Horticulture' Office), which Dr. Hogg edits, is, as usual, full of useful matter. So is the Year-Book of Photography (Piper & Carter).—Mr. Shirley Hibberd maintains the high reputation of the Garden Oracle ('Gardener's Magazine' Office), but it is hard to understand why "a design in the Early English style" should be dubbed the "Queen Anne Window Conservatory"!—Our list concludes with the useful Agricultural Gazette Almanac ('Agricultural Gazette' Office).

We have also some diaries on our table. Fulcher's Ladies' Memorandum Book (Sudbury, Pratt) retains the features which have given it so long a lease of popularity.—The City Diary (Collingridge), which has now attained its eighteenth year, is one of the best shilling diaries issued.

THE EARL OF CRAWFORD AND BALCARNE.

ALTHOUGH little known to the outer world, for he held aloof from politics and from public life, the late Lord Crawford was highly esteemed by a limited circle. Born in 1812, educated first at Eton and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge, he developed even in his boyhood the studious habits and the love for collecting books which distinguished him throughout life, and which were combined in him with gentle manners and chivalrous feeling. His dominant idea was the creation of a perfect library, embracing all the best works in every language, and forming a literary picture of the history of civilization. He differed totally from other book-hunters—those who usually amass rare books at random, or else gather the whole of the literature relating to some special subject. Even when at Eton, before the year 1830, and at an age when most boys think of little else than games and lessons, he paid visits to dealers in old books, and bought the nucleus of the De Bry collection, which was afterwards one of the ornaments of his library. The name of Lord Lindsay (the title which he bore then, and which he retained till his father's death in 1869) was well known to Thorpe, Rodd, John Bohn, and the other booksellers of a former generation. In 1831 he attached himself almost exclusively to Mr. H. G. Bohn, and that redoubtable bookseller acted for nearly a quarter of a century as Lord Lindsay's agent. In 1855, when Mr. Bohn had drifted out of his old business and become a great publisher, the agency was transferred to Mr. Quaritch, and for the next twenty-five years Lord Lindsay was actively engaged in collecting from all parts of the world the scattered items which make up the famous Crawford Library.

Lord Lindsay's natural love for historic studies was intensified by his researches into the annals of his own celebrated house. Before he was twenty-three he printed (in 1835) for private circulation 'The Lives of the Lindsays,' of which we spoke last week (it was regularly published in 1840, and again in 1849). A desire to gratify his deep religious feelings led him to travel in Syria and Egypt, and the literary result was his 'Letters from the Holy Land,' a successful and fascinating book. In 1841 he printed privately at Wigan a volume of ballads translated from the German, and published a 'Letter on the Evidences of Christianity,' serving to supplement similar disquisitions in his 'Letters from the Holy Land,' which had won the praise of Dean Milman. In 1843 there appeared a pamphlet by Lord Lindsay, entitled 'Progression by Antagonism,' full of subtle abstractions, formulated with the precision of the mediæval schoolmen. Crude and imperfect as was this brief view of the development of humanity and civilization, marred, too, by the usual defects of preconceived theory, it yet showed him to be an ardent student and the possessor of a keen and flexible intellect. In 1847 he published the book by which his name will be best remembered. His 'Sketches of the History of Christian Art' were the result of observations made during his travels in Italy, Germany, France, and the Low Countries, and were inspired by the same religious fervour which had guided his footsteps in the Holy Land. This work represents, in fact, another side of his investigations into the origin and history of Christianity.

Lord Lindsay's library still continued to grow in value as well as extent, the rule followed being to procure the first edition and the best edition of every important work in literature, without limitation of language or period. He would have everything which marked a new discovery in knowledge, a new departure in history or science, a new phase in opinion or intellectual cultivation. In this spirit he collected the original editions of all the romances of chivalry. The earliest productions of typography attracted him also, as well as the writings upon that subject; and amongst his most treasured volumes were the Bible and the Catholicon printed by Gutenberg (the latter a vellum copy), Fust and Schoeffer's Latin Bible of 1462 (on vellum), the first printed classic ('Cicero de Officiis') by Fust and Schoeffer, 1465, and the famous blockbook, 'Speculum Humane Salvationis,' on which were founded

Lord Lindsay's earlier investigations had led him to the acquisition of books on genealogy and family history: he went on increasing his collection by the addition of everything he could obtain of value upon those subjects. He was thus equipped with appropriate learning when (in 1845), with the help of a professional lawyer, he prepared the 'Case' in assertion of his father's claim to the premier peerage of Scotland, the decision upon which, in 1848, added the earldom of Crawford to that of Balcarne. A similar claim to the title of Duke of Montrose was advanced by Lord Lindsay on his father's behalf in 1850, and sustained with equal force and learning, but failed on the ground of inconvenience, as it would have involved the co-existence of two dukedoms of Montrose.

He printed a couple of pamphlets in 1862 on Scepticism and on the English Hexameter. About 1863 he wrote a letter to the Times, defending 'the English aristocracy as a political institution' against Mr. Bright. This interference in political discussion he justified on the ground that he was not only a peer, but also a literary man. In 1868 Lord Lindsay printed his only other contribution to politics in a pamphlet on 'Conservatism'; and the Vatican Council of 1869 drew from him a treatise on 'Œcumenicity in relation to the Church of England,' published in 1870. In 1869 his father died, and he succeeded to the title which he bore henceforward.

In 1872 Lord Crawford published 'Etruscan Inscriptions Analyzed,' in which he broached a theory concerning that still enigmatical language which has been universally rejected (Athen. No. 2359). But the book showed him to be a diligent student of philology. In 1876 Mr. Murray produced a 'metrical tale,' entitled 'Argo: the Golden Fleece,' in which the story of Jason and Medea was rehearsed anew. The work itself betrayed more poetic taste than poetic power; but the introduction in blank verse prefixed to it was a charming composition, and revealed his inner life, the sweetness of his domestic relations, the manner of his working, better than any other writer could depict them. It forms an exquisite piece of autobiography without egoism.

His literary pursuits and his love for collecting books were considerably favoured by the fact that Lady Crawford aided her husband in the administration of his estates in Lancashire and Scotland. With tastes akin to his own (and inherited from a mother whose accomplishments and appreciation of what was best in art and literature were warmly admired by her son-in-law), she yet denied herself their full indulgence in order to allow her husband leisure for the studies in which he took delight and by which she was proud to see him distinguished.

As a book collector and library creator Lord Crawford possessed especial gifts in his extraordinary industry, memory, and systematic mode of work. He was familiar not only with the literary history of many nations, possessing even a tolerable knowledge of Oriental history, but made himself master in each department of all the bibliographical details which would be needed for guidance in the formation of such a library as he aimed at making. He was, of course, unacquainted with many of the languages of which he possessed the literary records, but he took care to have catalogues and analyses of all the books which he could not read made by special scholars. With these exceptions his library catalogue was compiled by himself; and as he did this with great care, tracing the chronological development of each section, he was able to note most of the missing links in every chain, with the object of supplying them in course of time. Fresh lists of dendrata were constantly supplied and furnished to Mr. Quaritch, so that no opportunity should be lost. His agent and himself were thus perpetually on the look out for rare books, and he read carefully every auction catalogue and every bookseller's catalogue which he received. In works of pure science his library is more deficient than in any other department; but the present earl, who is already distinguished for his attainments in science, has made a special collection of books on astronomy, geometry, and the allied subjects, which when added to the paternal library will make it wonderfully complete. The taste for scientific pursuits shown by the present earl was always looked upon by his father as an instance of the "interrupted and recurrent heredity" which has been noticeable in various members of the family.

AUTHORS AND PRINTERS' READERS.

Dec. 20, 1880.

I DID not mean to trouble you with another letter, but in closing this correspondence—so far as I am concerned—I have only to ask Mr. Lynch to bear in mind that my complaint was of the grievance suffered by an author when reprimanded by critics for errors he had corrected in proof. If Mr. Charles Dickens "gracefully acknowledged his obligations to printers' readers," I can only suppose that the great novelist had something to thank them for, and that had his corrections been skipped his acknowledgments would not have been graceful. Of course if, as Mr. Lynch says, "publishers allow not a penny in the estimates for reading," then the matter, as regards printers, ends. I had never heard that this was the case and wonder that it should be so. What Mr. Lynch means by my "abusive epithets" I cannot imagine. I should be sorry indeed to think that you or any of your readers take his view of the temper of my letter.

W. CLARK RUSSELL.

THE GRANDFATHER OF CAXTON AND THE FATHER OF CHAUCER.

British Museum, Dec. 22, 1880.

AMONG the Additional Charters in the Department of Manuscripts are two documents containing brief notices of the Caustons of London, which seem to have escaped the notice of Mr. Blades in his 'Life of William Caxton,' where, on p. 4 of his last edition, he speaks of the various families of that name scattered over England. Although he states generally that the name appears frequently in the early records of London, it may perhaps be not uninteresting to particularize the two I have spoken of above.

On the twenty-fifth day of November, in the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Edward III., a writ was issued from the Privy Seal Office to Adam de Bury, Mayor of London, and to John de Cantelbrige, the City Chamberlain, ordering them to furnish a complete return of all property in the City given or bequeathed, "ad manum mortuam," for religious purposes from the earliest times up to the date of the writ, as entered in their records. Appended to a copy of this writ are twenty-one rolls, containing the returns made in accordance with its terms from the seventh year of Edward I. up to the thirty-eighth of Edward III., a period of eighty-eight years. On the back of the thirteenth roll is the following entry:—"Ad hustengum tentum in London die lune proxima ante festum Sancte Margarete Virginis anno regni regis Edwardi tertij post conquestum sexto decimo. Testamentum Matildis de Causton de tenementis legatis ad Cantariam vj marcas. In testamento Matildis de Causton probato et irrotulato die et anno supra dictis continetur quod legavit domos suas quas inhabitavit in vico de Candelwekestrete Et omnes domos suas in venella Sancti Swythini Rectori ecclesie Sancti Swythini in Candelwekestrete qui pro tempore fuerit ad inueniendum vnum Capellanum perpetuum in dicta ecclesia pro anima sua celebraturum. Ita quod dictus Capellanus percipiat vj marcas annuatim pro labore suo."

entry relating to Henry de Causton, viz:—"Ad hustengum tentum in London die lune proxima ante festum Apostolorum Simonis et Jude anno regni regis Edwardi tertij post conquestum vicesimo quarto. Testamentum Henrici de Causton vj marcas. Henricus de Causton Civis et Mercator in testamento suo probato et irrotulato legavit ad sustentacionem vnius Capellani diuina imperpetuum pro anima sua in ecclesia Sancti Thome Apostoli celebraturi sex marcas quieti redditus Percipiendas de omnibus tenementis que perqueiuit de Willelmo Galeys et Alano atte Munte in dicta parochia imperpetuum."

Also, on the back of the same roll is an entry relating to the will of John de Caustone, as follows:—"Ad hustengum tentum in London die lune proxima post festum Translacionis Sancti Edwardi anno regni regis Edwardi tertij post conquestum vicesimo septimo. Testamentum Johannis de Caustone de tenementis legatis ad Cantariam. Dictis die et anno probatum et irrotulatum fuit testamentum Johannis de Caustone in quo continetur quod legavit Jacobo Andreu et Matildi vxori sue ad terminum vite eorundem totum illud tenementum suum cum shopis et alijs pertinencijs quod habuit in parochia Sancti Pancracij iuxta Sopereslane: Et totum illud tenementum cum suis pertinencijs quod habuit ex dono et feoffamento Simonis Bond in parochia Sancti Antonij et post eorum decessum remaneant imperpetuum Priorias et Conventui de Haliwell: ad inueniendum inde vnum Capellanum in ecclesia Sancti Pancracij pro anima sua perpetuis temporibus celebraturi, &c."

On the front of the nineteenth roll is mention of William de Causton, mercer, whose will was proved in 1354, and who may well have been the grandfather of the great William Caxton the printer, if we accept (according to Mr. Blades) the year 1422 as the date of his birth, and whose occupation as a mercer may have led his namesake the printer to be apprenticed to the same company:—"Ad hustengum tentum in London die lune proxima post festum Sancti Lucie Euangeliste anno regni regis Edwardi tertij post conquestum vicesimo octauo. Testamentum Willelmi de Caustone x marcas. Willelmus de Caustone Mercer in testamento suo dictis die et anno probato et irrotulato legavit ad sustentacionem curiam Capellani diuina imperpetuum in ecclesia Sancti Pancracij pro anima sua celebraturi decem marcas quieti redditus percipiendas de toto capitali tenemento cum domibus mansionibus shopis et alijs suis pertinencijs quod perqueiuit de Johanna Corpe vxore quondam Simonis Corpe, Johanne de Duresme et Thoma Corpe executoribus ipsius Simonis in parochia Sancti Pancracij, &c."

"Testamentum dicti Willelmi xiiij libras vj solidatas. Dictus Willelmus in testamento suo legavit ad sustentacionem duorum Capellanorum diuina in dicta Ecclesia Sancti Pancracij pro anima sua imperpetuum celebraturorum quatuordecim libras et sex solidatas quieti redditus percipiendas de tenementis subscriptis videlicet de toto illo tenemento cum suis pertinencijs quod quondam fuit Henrici le Gangeour Civis Londoniensis in venella vocata le Wewelane in parochia Sancti Michaelis de Paternoster church vnam marcam Et de shopis Alicie quondam filie Rogeri Houseband ex parte orientali tenementi sui in parochia Sancti Mathie in Friday-strete London octo solidos Et de omnibus tenementis cum pertinencijs que Stephanus de Cantelbrige habuit in parochia beate Marie de Stanynglane octo solidos et quatuor denarios et de omnibus tenementis Rogeri le Ropere et de tota illa shopa cum pertinencijs quam Radulfus de Vptone quondam tenebat in parochia beate Marie atte Wode duas marcas Et de quadam shopa cum pertinencijs quam Johannes de Bermyngham tenuit in parochia beati Michaelis atte Corner London decem solidos et tres denarios Et de tenementis Radulfi de Ikelyngham cum pertinencijs que

Towards the foot of the same roll is another bequest of the same William Causton, mercer:—"Ad hustengum tentum in London die lune proxima post festum Sancte Katerine anno regni regis Edwardi tertij post conquestum tricesimo primo. Memorandum de licentia Regie. Dominus Rex concessit licentiam per cartam suam dictis die et anno irrotulata executioibus Willelmi de Causton quod ipse nomine dicti Willelmi duo Mesuagia et tres shopas cum pertinencijs in London Rectori ecclesie Sancti Pancracij ad certa pietatis opera inde facienda libere possent ad manum mortuam assignare prout in dicta carta domini Regis plenius continetur."

Before I pass on to the second document of which I spoke at the beginning of my letter, I should like to draw attention to the name of Richard Chaucer (who is believed by Speght to have been the father of the poet Chaucer), which occurs in the following entry on the front of the seventeenth roll:—"Ad Hustengum tentum in London die lune in festo Sancte Margarete Virginis anno regni regis Edwardi tertij post conquestum vicesimo tertio. Testamentum Ricardi Chaucere de tenementis legatis ad Cantariam. Ricardus Chaucere in testamento suo dictis die et anno probato et irrotulato legavit parochianis et persone ecclesie de Aldirmanbury totum tenementum suum cum Taberna et alijs pertinencijs in vico vocato la Rrole super Corrierum de Kyrounlane ad inueniendum vnum Capellanum diuina in ecclesia de Aldirmanbury pro anima sua imperpetuum celebrantem."

The second document belongs to the thirtieth year of Edward I., and is headed "Indentura de nominibus diuersorum quibus Rex tenetur pro frumento, pane, ceruisia, carnibus, pisce et alijs rebus diuersis captis ab eisdem apud London et in partibus circumiacentibus ad expensas hospitij Regis tempore Parlamenti habiti apud Westmonasterium mensibus Julij et Augusti anno regni Regie predicti tricesimo cuius Indenture vna pars remanet in Garderoba et altera pars penes Maiorem Ciuitatis London." Under the heading "Butellere" occurs the entry, "Johanni de Caustone pro eodem xvij. li. iij. s. d." In the same document and under the same heading is the entry, "Baldewyno le Chaucer pro eodem 12 s." In the list of persons of the name of Chaucer living in the fourteenth century, given by Sir N. H. Nicolas in his memoir of Geoffrey Chaucer, no such name as Baldwin le Chaucer is to be found.

Literary Gossip.

WE regret to say that we are forced to postpone the publication of Mr. E. Schuyler's article on the Literature of Russia during 1880.

EARLY in January, we are glad to say, Prof. Max Muller will bring out two volumes of 'Selected Essays on Language, Mythology, and Religion.' Prof. Max Muller's former collection of essays, the 'Chips from a German Workshop,' filled, it will be remembered, four volumes, and have run through several editions. "But now," says the professor,

"when a wish for a cheaper edition of some of these essays had been frequently expressed, both by teachers and pupils in schools and universities, thought the time had come to subject them once again to a more careful sifting, to remove those which had done their work and were no longer wanted, and to add a few which had been published in different periodicals during the last years, hoping thus to enable these two smaller volumes of 'Selected Essays' to find new friends in places where their more bulky predecessors could gain no access. I have tried to improve these essays from year to year, with the help of the excellent criticisms to which they have been subjected, and by the light of new researches, carried on without interruption by myself and by others, in the immense domain of the science of ancient thought. In all that is essential they have remained unchanged, but I believe that no honest criticism which has reached me has ever been passed by unnoticed, and that no important materials have been overlooked which have been added to our stock of knowledge since the time when these essays first saw the light."

At a meeting last week of the Council of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies it was decided to hold in future four meetings in London, in the months of January, March, June, and October, for the reading of papers and for discussion. These meetings will take place at 5 p.m. in the Society's rooms, 22, Albemarle Street. There will also be held similar meetings in each term, one at Oxford and one at Cambridge. The dates for the coming year will shortly be announced. The Society's Journal, which has just been issued at 30s. to those who are not members of the Society, will, we are informed, be supplied at a reduced rate to libraries and other public bodies wishing to subscribe, provided that in each case official application is made direct to the Council.

A petition is circulating for signature in the University of Oxford, to be submitted to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, in which they are requested to publish a yearly volume of 'Anecdota Oxoniensia,' which should contain extracts or collations from MSS. preserved in the libraries of Oxford, and more especially in the Bodleian Library, and be extended in course of time to MSS. of other English libraries. The Notices et Extraits brought out by the Academy of Inscriptions in Paris is mentioned as a model. The petition concludes with the following passage:—

"It is suggested that such a work is almost imperatively called for if Oxford is to hold its proper place among the universities of Europe, not only as an institution for teaching, but also as a centre of learned discovery. And it seems probable that if such an organ was well established, it would not only give a stimulus to the study of MSS. here, but attract contributors from other great libraries, such as the British Museum, the Phillips, the Ashburnham, &c."

We hope that this time the Delegates may give serious attention to this petition, and undertake the important publication suggested to them.

The Weekly Register will pass into the hands of a new proprietor on the 1st of January, when it will begin a fresh series with a new and enlarged staff, Mr. Charles Kent, who has had the direction of it for the last seven years, still retaining the editorship.

BETWEEN 1792 and 1795 Mr. Henry Maire of Lartington (afterwards Sir Henry Lawson) deduced the genealogies of the principal Roman Catholic families in England.

There was, and is, great difficulty in compiling the pedigrees of Roman Catholics during the period when, from recusancy and other obstacles and disabilities, few of the ordinary means of record were accessible to them; and it has been determined, with the consent of its owner, Sir John Lawson, Bart., to print Mr. Maire's MS., with additions, proofs, and evidences, elaborating the descents not only anterior to their first dating by Mr. Maire, and collaterally, but bringing them down to the present time. It will be edited by the Somerset Herald and Dr. Jackson Howard.

A LADY has again obtained a first-class at Cambridge in the papers set for the Moral Sciences Tripos.

THE Rev. G. W. Collins, Keble College, Oxford, is engaged upon an edition of the 'Sepher Hashshoham,' a Hebrew grammar and lexicon by Rabbi Moses, of London (lived about 1250 A.D.), from the unique Bodleian MS. collated with a fragment of it lately acquired by the St. Petersburg Library. This is, we believe, the only literary work in existence by an English Jew before the expulsion of his race from England.

INDIAN civilians, military men, and Eastern travellers generally have long felt the great inconvenience of having no other means of acquiring the modern vernacular Persian than by actually settling themselves down in the country and picking up the language while mixing with the people. There is no lack of Persian literature, but the language of those books best known to students is as unlike the Persian of every-day life as the French of Voltaire is unlike the patois of the Channel Islands. The result is that when "an accomplished scholar" has to make his first speech at the court of the Shah, that may happen which, it is said, actually did happen to a distinguished personage a few years ago—the question may be politely asked what language his excellency is making use of. Travellers will therefore be glad to hear that an introductory handbook to modern Persian is in an advanced state of preparation by two competent Persian scholars, Mr. W. H. Haggard, Second Secretary to H.M. Legation at Teheran, and Mr. Guy Le Strange, who has spent the last three years in travelling through Persia. The work these gentlemen have been engaged upon is a modern drama by Mirza Ta'afar Karajeh-Daghi, entitled 'The Vizier of the Khan of Lenkeran.' The play, which is said to abound in incident and to contain a faithful picture of modern Persian life, is to be published in the original, with an interpagated English translation, and will be furnished with copious explanatory notes, together with remarks on pronunciation and a complete vocabulary. The editors hope to go to press early in the spring.

MR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, junior, son of the well-known poet, is delivering a course of twelve lectures, on the Common Law of the United States, at the Lowell Institute, Boston.

THE Deutsches Montagsblatt states that a first edition of the new volume of Gustav Freytag's 'Ahnent,' consisting of 27,000 copies, was taken by the booksellers within three days after publication. A second edition of 6,000 copies will be ready in a few days. The great majority of the readers of Freytag are found in North Germany, Silesia, and the Russian Baltic provinces.

THE Senate of the Punjab University presented an address to the Viceroy on the occasion of his recent visit to Lahore, in which they expressed a hope that the promise made at the Delhi Durbar on the 1st of January, 1877, to raise the college to the full status of a university, might be fulfilled. In answer to the objection often made, that the college does not sufficiently encourage the study of English, they pointed out that of the 1,747 students who have presented themselves for the various examinations in arts, 1,217 have come up for the English examination, and that the number of candidates for the entrance examination in English has increased from 26 in 1873 to 193 at the present examination. The tone of Lord Ripon's reply appeared to be favourable to the request of the Senate.

DR. KOHN, Rabbi at Buda-Pesth, will shortly publish an essay in the Hungarian language on Jewish sources for the history of Hungary. He is also preparing a history in German of the Jews in Hungary. We hope that his essay in Magyar will be contained in full in his German book.

WE believe that Prof. Hartwig Derembourg, of Paris, has made many discoveries in the Ecceurial Library, where he went lately on a mission from the French Government for Arabic history and literature. His report will, no doubt, appear in the Archives des Missions Scientifiques, published by the Ministry of Public Instruction in Paris.

THE Report just published on the progress of education in Bombay for the year 1879-80 shows favourable results. The total number of pupils on the rolls has increased during the last fourteen years from 117,547 to 275,133. During the year the losses of the three previous years of famine and scarcity were more than made up. In connexion with the University, the most important changes have been the addition of a syndic to represent the sciences, and the issue, at the instance of Sir R. Temple, of new regulations for the B.A. course, by means of which students are allowed to specialize their studies. Some of the authorities of the University are opposed to the new regulations, as tending to lower the standard of general culture amongst the students. The average attendance at the Elphinstone College has slightly decreased, but it is stated that the University class at the Grant Medical College is the largest ever reported. Dr. Cook declares that the college only requires a Professor of Pathology in the dead-house and pathological laboratory to render it equal to the best medical schools in Europe. In all institutions connected with Government there has been a great increase in the number of students of English.

THE death is announced of the last of the Misses Innes, who founded and edited 'Lodge.'

It is reported from Bombay that native girls are being induced to present themselves at public examinations, either for entrance to the University or for admission to the public service. One young lady, who obtained the scholarship offered a few years ago by Miss Mary Carpenter to native girls, lately passed the second-class examination for admission to the public service. Another Parsee girl presented herself at the recent matriculation examination of the Bombay University.

THE gold medal, together with a prize of ten guineas, offered by the Council of Trinity College, London, for the best essay on 'Middle-Class Education: its Influence on Commercial Pursuits,' has been awarded to Miss Agnes Amy Bulley, secretary of the College for Women, Manchester.

JUST as we are going to press we have received the tidings of a great loss to English letters. Like Thackeray, "George Eliot" has passed away during Christmas week; she has died within two-and-twenty years of the time when 'Adam Bede' revealed that another great novelist was ready to delight the world.

SCIENCE

A Treatise on Comparative Embryology. By F. M. Balfour, M.A., F.R.S. Vol. I. (Macmillan & Co.)

PROBABLY no man has ever done more for the advancement of the science of biology generally by the time that he has attained the age of thirty than has Mr. Balfour: scarcely any have ever done so much. Certainly no man has ever produced so much valuable new knowledge in the special department of embryology as has this distinguished representative of the modern school of natural science, which flourishes with such abundant promise of a brilliant future at Cambridge, and the development of which in the biological department is principally due to the untiring energy of Prof. Michael Foster. The number of the important papers on vertebrate embryology which Mr. Balfour has produced is truly astonishing. The principal of them are embodied in his monograph on 'The Development of the Elasmobranch Fishes.' His 'Elements of Embryology,' which he published in conjunction with Prof. Michael Foster, has already gone through two editions. The work now under consideration is an entirely new one, and is by far the best on its subject existing in any language. It embodies all that is known from the researches of the numerous original workers at present engaged in the study of embryology, but there is scarcely any subject treated in it on which Mr. Balfour has not valuable observations of his own to add to those of other investigators, or on which he is not able to speak as a critic specially qualified by direct personal acquaintance with the facts. The book is profusely illustrated with excellent woodcuts, by far the larger part of which are new, having been most carefully engraved from original memoirs or from the author's own papers or drawings by Mr. Collinge. A good many of them are in white on a black ground—a very effective arrangement. In others, white lines are introduced upon more or less shaded backgrounds. These are especially pretty and admirably suited to the display of the details of embryological structure, and strike us as novel in appearance. Full references to bibliography are given at the ends of all the chapters, and the value of the work is thus very greatly increased. Certain less important details are given in small print, in order that the student may be guided in his reading. The work is confined to the embryology of the Metazoa—that is, all animals except the Protozoa, the Infusoria, Rhizopoda, &c.—and the present volume deals with invertebrates only, the Ascidians not being included.

As stated in the introduction, "Great as is the interest attaching to the simple and isolated life-histories of individual organisms, this interest has been increased tenfold by the generalizations of Mr. Darwin." Almost all animals in their development from the egg to the adult condition go through as widely different a series of forms as is familiar to all in the case of the butterfly. In the majority of animals the series of stages is much more complicated, the butterfly's being a comparatively simple case. The larval stages, as a result of Mr. Darwin's theory, now so firmly established, stand to us as a substitute for the missing links in the series of organisms which are otherwise lost, many of them absolutely, others for the present, at all events, owing to the imperfection of the geological record, or our limited knowledge or possibilities of investigation of geological deposits. It becomes more and more apparent that modern works on any biological subject can be of comparatively little value unless they are planned and built up in direct accordance with the teachings of the theory of evolution. If such be not the case, the facts detailed will not hang together and explain one another, those of importance will not receive sufficient prominence, and the whole will be more or less meaningless to the student.

Although Prof. Haeckel has treated embryology from an evolutionary point of view in his well-known popular works, Mr. Balfour's is the first strictly scientific work on embryology which has appeared in which, as in Prof. Gegenbaur's 'Comparative Anatomy,' Mr. Darwin's theory is made the keynote of the whole. It is impossible here to follow the author into the intricate details of comparative embryology.

The aims of the science of embryology are, as set forth by the author in the introduction: 1. "To form a basis for phylogeny," or the construction of the family tree of the animal kingdom. 2. "To form a basis for organogeny, or the origin and evolution of organs."

In the department of phylogeny the following are the most important points aimed at: 1. "To test how far comparative embryology brings to light ancestral forms common to the whole of the Metazoa." 2. "How far some special larval form is constantly reproduced in the ontogeny of the members of one or more groups of the animal kingdom, and how far such larval forms may be interpreted as the ancestral type for these groups." 3. "How far such forms agree with living or fossil forms in the adult state, such an agreement being held to imply that the living or fossil form in question is closely related to the parent stock of the group in which the larval form occurs." By the direct action of physical causes, or these acting through natural selection, animals are almost as much liable to modifications of form during their embryonic or larval life as during their adult existence. In many cases stages of development have been lost, in others modifications in other cases, again, special stages have been developed anew to suit special conditions under which larval life is carried on. Hence the embryological record is, like the geological, imperfect; and it is only by dovetailing the two records and taking advantage of those parts in which they coincide that we can see where gaps do not coincide and in conjunction with the teachings of comparative anatomy of the adult animal the great problem of phylogeny is being gradually worked out. In no science is it more easy to jump to conclusions, and even distinguished authors have made themselves conspicuous by rather hasty generalizations in the phylogenetic department of embryology, though we do not blame them for important results are as often attained by means of hasty speculations, subsequently tested and worked up to, as by any slower or more gradual process. Mr. Balfour, as will be gathered from the above-quoted sentences as the result of the great width and depth of his embryological knowledge, is very fully aware of the possible fallacies which may underlie what may appear at first sight to be most patent phylogenetic generalizations. He is extremely cautious, and weighs his evidence with great deliberation as judgment.

Perhaps the most interesting subject dealt with in the book is the impregnation of the ovum, concerning which so many interesting discoveries have been lately made. The egg of Asterias glabra is taken as the type in the section devoted to the subject. In this egg, as appears from the investigation of Fol, shortly before impregnation, a clear nucleus is formed, round which the protoplasm of the egg becomes radiately striated. This is known as the female pronucleus. The most favourable period for fecundation is about an hour after the formation of this pronucleus. If at this time the spermatozoa are allowed to come in contact with the egg, their heads become enveloped in an investing mucilaginous coat. The egg, responding to the stimulus of their presence, a prominence grows up from the surface of the protoplasm of the egg, and rises to meet the nearest spermatozoon until it comes in contact with it. Normally only this one spermatozoon of the vast numbers available is concerned in the fertilization. It makes its way into the egg through the promicrovilli, and at the same moment a distinct microvilli is raised from the surface of the egg, all over, and prevents the entrance of other spermatozoa. The spermatozoon within the egg forms there a clear nucleus, surrounded by a radiate surrounding of protoplasm, called the male pronucleus. As soon as the spermatozoon approaches the male pronucleus, the latter rapidly approaches the male pronucleus, apparently by means of its inherent amoeboid contractions, and fuses with it. According to Selenka, the female pronucleus sends out processes as the male pronucleus approaches it, and the protoplasmic processes which embrace the latter. From the fusion of the two nuclei arises the first segmentation nucleus of the impregnated egg, which soon divides into subdivides in the process of the formation of the foundation of the embryo.

Mr. Balfour's book is indispensable to all biological students and laboratories.

RECENT INDIAN GEOLOGICAL PUBLICATIONS.

MR. WYNNE, of the Indian Geological Survey, has contributed to the Memoirs an important monograph on the Indian Salt Range, in continuation of a previous and fuller description of the portion east of the Indus. The present paper (which runs to about one hundred pages) deals exclusively with the western or trans-Indus extension of the Salt Range, which the author describes as making a "sigmoid" curve from Kalabagh on the Indus to a point north of Tank, its outer edge being for the most part strongly scarped towards the plains of the Indus. The coincidence between the physical features and the geological structure of the ground is intimate, the axial lines of the mountains carrying on the Salt Range feature being also axes of anticlinal lying for the most part along the scarped activities presented towards the Indus plains. These plains are part of the great quaternary desert flat over which the Indus has in past times capriciously wandered towards the Arabian Sea. Whether they are due in any degree to marine erosion is uncertain, though the sea may very possibly once have covered the low ground in question. The ridges of the Salt Range, as they exist at present, doubtless mark the same great later or post-Tertiary period of mountain-forming activity in which originated not only the remainder of the Salt Range, but also the Western Himalaya and the Suliman and Afghan ranges. The geological structure of the trans-Indus extension of the Salt Range repeats in a great measure that of the western portion of the Salt Range proper, but with some considerable differences. The Palæozoic rocks, so far as presented by the red marl, rock salt, and gypsum, are quite the same, and so are the Carboniferous and Triassic groups, but others of the sub-Carboniferous beds present themselves with a different association from those on the Indus. Mr. Wynne assumes that in early Palæozoic times a considerable uniformity of conditions prevailed, giving rise to the formation over an extensive area of a curiously unstratified soft earthy rock, largely impregnated with iron and soluble salts, the latter frequently taking the shape of chemically formed layers. This may be looked upon as the physical origin of the range. The subsequent geological development of the region is tolerably clearly indicated by Mr. Wynne in an interesting summary, to which we must refer our readers, as such geological treatises from their very nature do not admit of being intelligibly epitomized. The mineral productions of the range are valuable, and consist of the salt of Kalabagh and the Lun Nullah, the alum of Kalabagh and the Chichali Pass, the coal or lignite collected in small quantities at times from the Jurassic beds of the Kalabagh Hills, and the gold washed from the Indus gravel. The gypsum of Kalabagh and the Khazor range is not as yet utilized in India, and the alum industry appears to have greatly fallen off. Building stones, such as the various limestones of the Carboniferous, Jurassic, and Nummulitic formations, occur in considerable variety.

The geology of the Ramkula and Tatapani coal-fields, an area between the rivers Kunhur and Rer, and comprising the north-eastern portion of the Sirguja State with some portions of South Rewa, was examined in 1878-9 by Mr. C. L. Griesebach, F.G.S., and its description forms Part II. Vol. XV. of the Memoirs. The palæontological works lately issued include a description of the Siwalikh and Narbada proboscidea by R. Lydekker, B.A.; a supplementary memoir on the crania of ruminants by the same author, rendered necessary by a recent publication by Prof. Rutimeyer on Tertiary ruminants, and the acquisition of some new Siwalikh bovine skulls by the Indian Museum; and, thirdly, a continuation of Dr. W. Waagen's description of the Salt Range fossils, dealing with specimens of the Cephalopoda and Gastropoda classes. These numbers of the Palæontologia Indica are illustrated by excellent lithographs as usual. Lastly, we note the publication of Mr. W. T. Blanford's admirable memoir on the geology of Western Sind, a brief notice of which we inserted some little time back. It undoubtedly forms one of the most important contributions to Indian geological literature that have been made for some time.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

A NEW astronomical periodical is to make its first appearance early in January, edited by Dr. Copeland, of Dun Echt, and Mr. Dreyer, of Dunink. Its title will be Uranus: an International Journal of Astronomy; it will be printed in Dublin at irregular intervals, like the Astronomische Nachrichten, the intention being to issue a number whenever sufficient material has been prepared. Like the valuable journal just referred to, papers will be admitted in different languages, so that, besides English, communications in French, German, or Italian will appear in their original form. The editors aim at a high-class scientific circulation, and "to keep their readers as fully acquainted as possible with the progress of astronomical research," securing also early dissemination of ephemerides of comets, &c., by issuing occasionally, when desirable, advance sheets on matters of pressing interest. Contributions for the first two numbers are promised from Lord Rosse, Lord Lindsay (now Earl of Crawford), Prof. Klinkerfues, Prof. Schjellerup, Dr. Ball, Dr. Borgen, and others.

A new comet was discovered by Dr. Pechüle at Copenhagen on the evening of Thursday, the 16th inst., when its place was, at 6 o'clock, R.A. 18° 44', increasing about 5" daily, N.P.D. 79° 30', decreasing about 40' daily. The discoverer described it as "small, bright, tolerably brilliant."

Further investigations concerning the motions of Swift's comet by several astronomers confirm the hypothesis that it is identical with Comet III. 1809, but make it probable that the period is about 5½ years, and that an unobserved return took place, therefore, in the spring of 1875.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

MESSRS. C. KEAN PAUL & Co. will publish next week an account of a visit to Algeria by Mr. Alexander A. Knox, formerly police magistrate in London. Whilst giving an amusing description of life in "the new playground," the author has aimed at producing a practical book for travellers.

We learn that the Abbé Beltrame, who was engaged as a missionary for a number of years on the White Nile, and had many opportunities of visiting unexplored regions, is now engaged at Verona in preparing an account of his journeys, and in compiling grammars and dictionaries of the languages of the savage tribes among whom he has lived, and especially that spoken by the Denka.

M. Veniukof has just published in Russian and French a 'Liste des Voyageurs Russes en Asie, depuis l'Occupation par les Russes du Bassin de l'Amour et de Semurétchie, 1854-80.' The brochure is divided into two parts, one giving the names of travellers and the regions explored by them down to 1875, and the other dealing with subsequent years. There are 212 names in the former category, and eighty-five in the latter.

Mgr. Taurin Cahagne and Père L. de Gonzague, accompanied by six others, left Marseilles on December 12th, on a missionary expedition to the Galla country.

M. Henri Duveyrier has lately communicated to the French Geographical Society a valuable monograph on the subject of the sources of the Niger or Joliba. Its basis, he points out, consists of two parts, under totally different meteorological conditions. A large part of one lies within the Sahara, and at the present time sends no feeders to the main stream; it is consequently only necessary to deal with the portion between Adamawa on the east and the Kuranko and Kong mountains on the west, whence from one side comes the Joliba or Niger, receiving near Lokoja the Benué, which comes from the other side of the region named and is undoubtedly the shorter of the two main divisions. M. Duveyrier then discusses the results of Major Laing's explorations in Sulinania in 1822, when that officer determined the source of the river to be in a certain Mount Loma in 9° 45' W. long., 9° 25' N. lat. From an examination of Major Laing's observations, however, M. Duveyrier is of opinion that the position fixed by him should be looked upon as merely provisional, as it was taken from a point nearly 100 miles distant, and the information as to the Niger rising there was furnished by natives. Turning to MM. Zweifel and Moutier's labours, he says that they found the Tembi-Kundu some seventy-nine miles south-west of Major Laing's Mount Loma, and that this river takes the name of the Joliba after receiving the Faliko, which has a shorter course. MM. Zweifel and Moutier place the source of the Tembi-Kundu in 10° 30' W. long., 8° 36' N. lat., in the peak of a mountain chain also called Mount Loma. Though we have no evidence of the range being continued so far, the country being unexplored, M. Duveyrier admits that the two Mount Lomas may belong to the same system, but he seemingly inclines to the belief that "Loma" probably signifies "mountain" or "summit," and is a term applied to the most prominent orographical feature of a whole region. All things considered, M. Duveyrier is of opinion that to MM. Zweifel and Moutier belongs the credit of discovering what is, according to our present information, the furthest source of the Niger.

The Mexican authorities are stated to have definitely refused to allow M. Déauré Charnay to remove from the country any of the antiquities discovered in the course of his archaeological explorations in Yucatan.

A geographical society has lately been formed at Oporto in connexion with that of Lisbon, under the title of Sociedade Portuguesa de Geographia.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Dec. 18.—The President, followed by Dr. C. W. Siemens, in the chair.—The following communications were read: 'On Actinometrical Observations made in India, at Mussoorie and Dehra, in October and November, 1879,' by Mr. J. B. N. Hennessey; 'On the Critical Point,' by Prof. W. Ramsay; 'Further Researches into the Colouring Matters of Human Urine, with an Account of their Artificial Production from Bihubin and from Humatin,' by Dr. C. A. McMunn; 'Note on the Determination of Magnetic Inclination in the Azores,' by Dr. Thorpe; 'On Heat Conduction in Highly Rarefied Air,' by Mr. W. Crookes; 'On the Thermo-Electric Behaviour of Aqueous Solutions with Platinum Electrodes,' 'Influence of Voltaic Currents on the Diffusion of Liquids,' and 'Experiments on Electric Osmosis,' by Dr. G. Gore.—The Society adjourned over the Christmas recess to January 6th.

GEOLOGICAL.—Dec. 15.—R. Etheridge, Esq., President, in the chair.—Rev. G. Clements, Messrs. W. E. Benton, J. K. Gulland, F. T. S. Houghton, G. B. Luke, and W. M. MacCulloch were elected Fellows; and Prof. L. Bellardi, of Turin, and Dr. M. Neumayr, of Vienna, Foreign Correspondents of the Society.—The following communications were read: 'On the Constitution and History of Grits and Sandstones,' by Mr. J. A. Phillips; and 'On a New Species of Trigonina from the Furber Beds of the Vale of Wardour,' by Mr. R. Etheridge; with a Note on the Stratigraphical Position of the Fossil by the Rev. W. R. Andrews.

ASIATIC.—Dec. 20.—Major-General Sir H. C. Rawlinson, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. H. Haggard was elected a Resident Member; and the Rajah of Bushwan, the Rev. C. Swinnerton, the Rev. J. Long, J. Vindhyeswari-Prasad, M. Vinson, and Mr. H. J. Allen, of H.M. consular service, China, were elected Non-Resident Members.—A paper was read, contributed by Prof. Dowson, 'On the Invention of the Indian Alphabet,' in which he examined the various views which have been held on this subject by Drs. Weber and Burnell, Prof. Max Müller, E. Thomas, and others, and announced his now definite opinion that the Indian alphabet was a truly Indian invention, though there are reasons for supposing that we do not now possess the original alphabet. Headed that General Cunningham and Mr. Thomas had expressed very decided opinions in favour of this view. The art of writing was, he thought, known long before there was any sign of an alphabet in India, while he considered it not unlikely that the first notion of it may have reached that country from without.

NUMISMATIC.—Dec. 16.—A. E. Copp, Esq., Treasurer, in the chair.—Mr. W. Arnold and the Rev. E. Maude were elected Members.—Mr. E. V. Head exhibited on behalf of Mr. A. Grant four Roman imperial auri: two of Julia Domna, one with the reverse IVNO, Juno holding a patera and sceptre, at her feet a peacock, and the other with the inscription MATER CASTROVVM, the empress standing before an altar sacrificing in front of two military standards, a type not uncommon on silver coins, but of extreme rarity on gold; one of Caracalla and Geta, as Cohen, p. 481, No. 4; and one of Plautilla, obverse, bust of the empress to right, reverse PROAGO IMPERI. Plautilla and Caracalla joining hands.—Mr. Durlacher exhibited a specimen of the silver medal formerly given by the Corporation of London to sworn brokers.—Mr. Krumbholz showed a Spanish dollar countermarked as a five-shilling token by the Deanston Cotton Mills.—Mr. E. H. Willett communicated a paper on the resident character of the office of Monetarius in Saxon times, and Mr. C. Roach Smith an account of certain large finds composed chiefly of coins of Tetricus, which are frequent both in this country and in France, and which must have been concealed about the period of the reunion of the provinces of Gaul and Britain to the Roman Empire.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Dec. 14.—Prof. W. H. Flower, LL.D., President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a Report on the additions that had been made to the Menagerie during November.—Mr. Selater exhibited and made remarks on a skin of a brown female of Pseustes galactes, formerly living in the aviary of the late Mr. G. D. Rowley.—Dr. Günther exhibited and made remarks on a skin of a new species of Rhynchocyon from Eastern Africa, discovered by Dr. Kirk.—Papers were read: by Prof. Huxley, 'On the Application of the Laws of Evolution to the Arrangement of the Vertebrata, and more particularly of the Mammalia,' by Lieut.-Col. H. H. Godwin-Austen, 'On the Anatomy of Perrucaria Gronoviana, Hiss, from Mentone,' pointing out its general relationship with Lecra Tornatellina, Lowe, of Madeira, and with Perrucaria follicula, Gronov. from Algiers, by Mr. A. G. Butler on a second collection of Lepidoptera made in Formosa by Mr. H. E. Hubon thirty-three new species were found in this collection.—by Mr. O. Thomas on a new species of Neithrodon obtained in Venezuela by the late Mr. D. Dyson, which was described as Neithrodon Aitoni,—and by Dr. Günther on some rare reptiles and Batrachians now or lately living in the Society's Gardens.

CHEMICAL.—Dec. 18.—Prof. H. E. Roscoe, President, in the chair.—The following communications were made: 'On the Estimation of Nitrogen by Combustion, including the Nitro Compounds,' by Mr. J. Ruffe. The author recommends the use of the following mixture instead of soda lime in the process of Will and Varentz: two molecules of sodium hydrate, one molecule of pure lime, and one molecule of sodium hyposulphite, the substance before burning being mixed with about its own weight of a mixture of sulphur and wood charcoal. By this process good results were obtained with sodium nitrate, picric acid, &c.—Dr. Carnelly then showed some experiments as to the effect of pressure in raising the melting points of ice, camphor, and mercuric chloride.—'On some Naphthalene Derivatives,' by Dr. Armstrong and Mr. Graham.

METEOROLOGICAL.—Dec. 1.—Mr. G. J. Symonds, President, in the chair.—Dr. J. W. Moore, Messrs F. Coventry, W. T. Paulin, J. Porter, and Capt. W. C. Smith were elected Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'Report on the Phenological Observations made in the Year 1880,' by the Rev. T. A. Preston. In February and June the weather was such as has rarely been experienced for farm operations. The cold winter broke up and mellowed the soil, and the dry open weather enabled farmers to clear their land. The dry May was not favourable for the hay, but still a crop with far more real nourishment in it than would be obtained from a rank growth would have been secured had it not been for the terrible floods of July in the Midland Counties. The corn, again, which was looking most promising till July, suffered much during that damp period, and had it not been for the subsequent fine weather, would have been ruined. But the unfavourable season of 1879 produced serious effects on vegetation, especially on trees and shrubs and their produce. The young wood of the trees was not ripened, and, as a natural consequence, the severe winter injured and killed enormous numbers. Laurustinus was generally killed to the ground. The evergreens in many cases lost large quantities of their leaves; hollies especially are mentioned by several observers, and privet hedges were sometimes quite leafless. Of fruit trees, apples and pears in some localities (but not all) were hardly able to put forth any bloom. Wall fruit was also a general failure, but this was partially owing to severe weather when the trees were in bloom, for in some instances the show of bloom was splendid. Gooseberries and currants produced enormous crops, and strawberries were very fine, but lasted an unusually short time. Seeds generally ripened with difficulty; much of the corn could not be ground, and a great deal was mixed up with roughly-ground Indian corn, and flavoured to induce the cattle to eat it. The crop of ordinary garden seeds was also far below its usual quality, and some of the favourite garden flowers were consequently very poor. Among the special features of the year may be mentioned the quantity of certain insects. Aphids was in astonishing numbers in the early part of the year. The apple-shoots, before the leaves expanded, were covered with this green fly, and among wild plants the mealy guelder-rose was especially attacked. The number of wasps appears to have exceeded all previous experience. The larvae of the gooseberry moth and of the gooseberry saw fly have also been destructive, and, an undoubted result of the wet of 1879, the larvae of the crane fly have been a perfect plague in some localities, and sheep ticks in others. Some small birds, no doubt, perished from the cold, but vast numbers migrated. The enormous number of larks which hastened to the Eastern Counties on the outbreak of cold weather was astonishing.—'On the Variations of Relative Humidity and Thermometric Dryness of the Air, with Changes of Barometric Pressure at the Kew Observatory,' and 'On the Relative Frequency of given Heights of the Barometer Readings at the Kew Observatory during the Ten Years 1870-79,' by Mr. G. M. Whipple.

PHILOLOGICAL.—Dec. 17.—Dr. J. A. H. Murray in the chair.—Mr. R. Ware was elected a member.—Mr. A. J. Ellis, President, read a letter from Miss Lloyd (sister-in-law of the late Dr. Bleek, of the Cape) describing a new Bushman language.—Mr. Ellis then gave an account of his researches on the 'Dialects of the Southern Counties of England,' that is, those south of the Thames from Great Marlow to the sea, and south of the Bristol Channel, with Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, South Warwick, South Northampton, and Oxfordshire, and also Middle and East Monmouth, East Brecon and Radnorshire in Wales, together with the peninsulas of Gowerland and South-west Pembroke in Wales, and of South-east Wexford in Ireland. All these dialects are closely related in idiom and pronunciation, the central portion of Wiltshire being typical. The prevailing characteristic is the 'reverted r' (for which the tongue points down the throat), with its varieties. The eastern parts, containing East Sussex and most of Kent, are distinguished by saying dr, dis, dat, dem, derr, kc., for the, this, that, them, there. The western parts, including West Somerset, Devon, and East Cornwall, have French ui in place of oo. West of Falmouth and Truro and Perran Zabuole, this and many other peculiarities disappear, and the language, while retaining several southern peculiarities, more resembles ordinary English spoken with a remarkable sing-song. Mr. Ellis's paper, which was based on 300 documents, mostly original and unpublished, collected during the last eleven years, was fully illustrated by particulars and examples.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Dec. 21.—Annual General Meeting.—Mr. W. H. Barlow, President, in the chair.—The report was read and adopted, and the premiums and prizes awarded at the close of the last session presented.—The following gentlemen were elected to fill the several offices in the Council for the ensuing year: Mr. J. Abernethy, President, Sir W. G. Armstrong, Sir J. W. Bazalgette, Mr. F. J. Brunwell, and Mr. J. Brunlees, Vice-Presidents; Mr. G. Berkeley, Mr. G. B. Bruce, Sir J. Cooke, Mr. E. A. Cowper, Mr. A. Giles, Sir C. A. Hartley, Mr. H. Hayter, Dr. W. Pole, Mr. R. Rawlinson, Mr. A. M. Rendel, Dr C. W. Siemens, Mr. D. Stevenson, Sir W. Thomson, Sir J. Whitworth, Bart., and Mr. E. Woods, other Members of Council.

Science Gossip.

DR. IRVINE, of Glasgow, exhibited and explained before the Mining Institute of Scotland, on Thursday, the 16th inst., his new safety lamp, which is constructed to emit a loud sound when an explosive mixture of gas and air enters it, and thus consequently readily indicates fire-damp in collieries.

DR. EDWARD HULL has just issued a fourth edition of his 'Coal-Fields of Great Britain.' This book is too well known to require any special notice from us. We may, however, briefly state that the author has availed himself of all trustworthy information, so as to bring his work up to the most recent date.

M. BACQUEMONT, whose labours in electrical science are well known, is to have a statue. The Paris Academy of Science have received 15,000 francs in reply to their appeal; 15,000 more are required to complete the work.

M. MARGADIERE brought before the Academy of Sciences a paper on "Radiophony," as he names the phenomenon of using a ray of light for the conveyance of sound. The sounds, he thinks, are due to the direct action of calorific radiations on the receiver, as he obtained the maximum effect in the invisible radiations of the red end of the spectrum.

PROF. THOMAS RYMER JONES, whose death we announced last week, was born in 1810, and studied for the medical profession in London and Paris. He became a Member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1833, and was the first professor appointed to the chair of Comparative Anatomy at King's College. In 1840 Prof. Rymer Jones became Fullerian Professor of Physiology at the Royal Institution, and in 1844 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He contributed largely to the 'Cyclopaedia of Anatomy and Physiology,' and in 1838 he published the work by which he is best known, 'A General Outline of the Animal Kingdom.' Notwithstanding his deafness, which compelled him to abandon the medical profession, he was an eloquent and attractive lecturer on natural history. Beyond the above named he was the author of several papers on different forms of mammalia.

THE deaths are announced of Mr. Frank Buckland, the well known zoologist and Inspector of Fisheries, and of M. Michel Chasles, the great geometrician.

PROF. M. E. PLANTAMOUR contributes to the Archives des Sciences Physiques et Naturelles for the 15th of November his usual excellent 'Résumé Météorologique de l'Année 1879, pour Genève et le Grand Saint-Bernard.'

MR. COLEMAN SELLERS publishes in the Journal of the Franklin Institute a paper in which he discusses 'The Metric System—Is it wise to introduce it into our Machine Shops?' which he italicizes as "this inconvenient system—this unhandy system of ten."

M. S. GRIMALDI describes in Rivista Scientifica Industriale for October 15th a new rain-gauge, which not only registers the quantity of rain which has fallen, but the hour of the fall and the duration thereof.

THE Records of the Geological Survey of India for November contains an interesting paper by Mr. W. Theobald, of the Geological Survey of India, 'On some Pleistocene Deposits of the Northern Punjab, and the Evidence they afford of an extreme Climate during a portion of that Period,' and other valuable papers, especially a 'Note on Rich or Alkaline Soils and Saline Well Waters,' by Dr. W. Carter.

THE Bulletin de l'Académie Impériale des Sciences de St. Pétersbourg, Tome XXVI, third and last part for 1880, just received, contains Diagnoses des Plantes Nouvelles de l'Asie, by J. J. Maximowicz, and five other important memoirs.

MR. HUGH MILLER, F.G.S., publishes in the Natural History Transactions of Northumberland and Durham and Newcastle-on-Tyne an exhaustive memoir 'On Tynedale Escarpments: their pre-Glacial, Glacial, and post-Glacial Features,' which will well repay a careful study.

FINE ARTS

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS—THE NINETEENTH WINTER EXHIBITION, including a Loan Collection of Works by the late George Hodgkin, is NOW OPEN, 12, Pall Mall East, from Ten to Five Daily.—ALFRED D. FRAPP, Secretary.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS—THE FIFTEENTH WINTER EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN from Ten to Five Daily, at the same place.—M. F. PHILLIPS, Secretary.

EXHIBITION OF CABINET PICTURES IN OIL—Dudley Gallery, Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly. THE FIFTEENTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION. Open daily from Ten to Five.—Admission 1s. Catalogue 6d. R. F. M. SAIR, Secretary.

THE SIXTEENTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF WATER COLOUR DRAWINGS is NOW OPEN, at THOMAS MEEHAN'S Gallery, Haymarket, next the Theatre.—Admission on presentation of Address Card.

HANOVER GALLERY, 4, New Bond Street. Entrance from Maddox Street. NOW OPEN the WINTER EXHIBITION OF OIL PAINTINGS by English Artists and of Original Drawings and Sketches published in 1880.—Lighted at dusk.

DORIS GREAT WORKS, 10, ST. MARK'S, THE PATRISTORIUM.—CHRIST'S BIRTH, JOHN THE BAPTIST, and MOSES, each at 22 feet wide, and 10 feet high. Painted by the hand of the artist. A Day Dream, Rainbow Landscape, Loch Lomond, Scotland, etc. at the DORIS GALLERY, 25, New Bond Street. Daily, from 10 to 12.

L'Archéologie Préhistorique. By Baron J. de Baye. (Paris, Leroux; London, Trubner & Co.)

THIS is a very important contribution to prehistoric archaeology, on account of numerous facts which the author's researches have brought to light, even if his deductions from them are not always and entirely satisfactory. Many published works on anthropology are filled with conjectures or arguments in defence or support of debatable questions, but here we have carefully conducted researches related with clearness, and a definite perception of their importance in elucidating one portion of this science. Occasionally, it must be admitted, the author is led into discussions not quite free from conjectures, but it is generally with unprejudiced candour, and with the view of suggesting an interpretation of a difficult problem which his discoveries have given rise to, and not for the purpose of doggedly sustaining any unreasonable or improbable theory of his own. The conjectures of others he also introduces, that he may point out to what extent they are illustrated or overthrown by the facts he has noted with so much fidelity.

It appears that Baron de Baye has carried on a great work of exploration in the valley of Petit Morin, in Champagne (Marne), for several years, and that from time to time its results were communicated at anthropological congresses and societies' meetings. These communications originated discussions, and many different opinions were expressed by the leading anthropologists of the day. Meanwhile further discoveries were constantly being made which demanded a more complete and connected account. During its preparation it was suggested to him that greater interest would be taken by the public, and the nature of his discoveries would be better understood, if he entered fully into the subject of prehistoric archaeology, so as to assign to his newly discovered caves their probable place among primeval abodes and sepulchres. Hence this well-written volume of 411 pages and its title.

The abundant flint and other stone implements scattered over the surface of the Champagne district induced M. de Baye to search for distinct traces of its permanent human occupation, and soon "plusieurs foyers des cavernes sépulchrales des grottes-habitations s'ouvrirent à la lumière." Their openings were so completely concealed by the growth of plants that no suspicion of their existence seems to have occurred to any one until then. Research led to the discovery of many groups of caverns on the gently sloping and cultivated chalk-hill sides of the valley of Petit Morin; and twelve such groups, each containing a varying number of caves, were found. In the territory of Coizard the group on the slope of Razet consists of as many as fifty. M. de Baye stated at the Stockholm Congress in 1874 that he had discovered 120 caves. All have been excavated in the chalk by means of stone implements, which have left their marks upon the walls. There appear to be three distinct classes, viz., those intended (1) for dwellings, (2) for storehouses, and (3) for sepulchres. The process of reasoning by which they have been distinguished leaves little room for cavil. The undisturbed condition of their contents supplies indisputable evidence of their particular uses. M. de Quatrefages wrote about them in 1876 as follows: "Après une étude aussi sérieuse que le permettait la brièveté de mon séjour, je reviens bien convaincu que M. de Baye a interprété avec beaucoup de justesse deux des points qui ont soulevé le plus de discussions. Je crois avec lui que les grottes doivent être distinguées en caveaux funéraires et en grottes d'habitation plus ou moins temporaires."

The caves belong to a non-metallic age, but on the question whether M. de Baye is justified in attributing them to the earliest portion of the neolithic period, and to a much older date than the dolmens of other parts of France, there is room for some difference of opinion. The seeming difference between the cave sepulchres and the dolmens may be due, as Dr. Broca has remarked, to geological conditions only. The implements and weapons of stone and bone, rude clay vessels, and personal ornaments differ neither in form nor material from many of those which are found in dolmens. The sculptures also do not support M. de Baye's view. Indeed, if he is right in every case in which he thinks a female to be represented, which may be doubted, the only difference between them and those of the dolmens is that the latter are incised and the former are in relief. The human face and breasts which he found have been observed incised upon a vertical stone in the Allée Couverte of Bellehay (Vise); and another example of an incised face (without breasts) exists on a vertical stone in the passage of the dolmen of Pierres Plates, Locmariaker (Morbihan). The cave sculptures have been coloured, and it is said that some of the dolmen sculptures show traces of colouring matter. Are there sufficient grounds, therefore, for the conclusion that the caves must be considerably more ancient than the dolmens? and is there reason to think that the human face thus sculptured is always intended for a female divinity, and for Dr. Broca's impression, or rather assertion, that "ces sculptures grossières, mais toujours les mêmes, qui représentent une divinité féminine sur les parois des antécaves de Baye, prouvent que le culte des temps néolithiques s'était déjà élevé jusqu'à l'anthropomorphisme"?

A curious fact in connexion with the cave sepulchral relics is the frequency of instances of trepanning, and the employment of small discs of human skull pierced for suspension, to be worn as personal ornaments, or tokens of prowess in combat, or superstitious symbols. Dr. Broca, having adopted the female deity theory, naturally regards trepanning as possessing in some cases a religious significance. "Un Dieu bien défini, un Dieu à forme humaine," he writes in the Bulletin of the Société d'Anthropologie de Paris, "doit avoir nécessairement des prêtres initiés et l'initiation par le sang, l'initiation chirurgicale," adding that the practice "se retrouve, on le sait, chez un très-grand nombre de peuples, même civilisés." Instances of trepanned skulls and skull amulets have been met with in the dolmens of Lozère.

Incinerated bones are very rare in these caves, and the inhumated bodies were found to have been laid on the back at full length. There is only one example of a contracted body. It is supposed that some caves were hastily dug expressly to contain the bodies of young warriors who had been slain in battle. They were deposited methodically in layers, with no intervening earth or slabs of stone, and from the multitude of square-ended flint arrow-heads discovered with them it is conjectured that by means of these weapons they had lost their lives. In more than one instance a vertebra had one of these flints firmly embedded in it. In other cases the skeletons of old and young of both sexes occupied a cave, and then it was noticed that ashes and fine earth had been carefully, and as it were lovingly, strewn over the bodies at the time of their interment. These were, therefore, family sepulchres. A remarkable custom is recorded. The body had been laid upon a flat stone obtained from some distant place and made red hot. This is proved by the flaking of the stone caused by the fire and the calcination of the chalk floor on which it rested. Another curious custom must also be mentioned. Within the cavity of some perfect skulls, the bones of infants, perforated shells which had served for ornaments, and flint arrow-heads had been intentionally introduced—how or why is a problem which the author does not attempt to solve, and which, with our present knowledge, must remain a mystery.

We have drawn attention to several very interesting particulars contained in this volume, and from want of space can only briefly allude to others of considerable importance, such as the finding of an amber bead, which implies a commercial relation with Northern people; of flint from Grand Pressigny; of rock crystal beads; of aragonite beads, probably from the volcanic region of the Auvergne; of jadite, from more distant lands; of callais or green turquoise, from some quite unknown locality. But discoveries of the like substances have been made in dolmen explorations in various parts of France, and notably in Armorica, where in one dolmen a piece of unshaped fibrolite and a lump of volcanic pumice stone were found in 1867. By comparing these and other finds with those related by M. de Baye we are warranted in expressing an opinion that there is little or nothing which justifies his view that a strong line of demarcation separates the Marne caves and their contents from the dolmens, and that the latter must yield precedence to the former with regard to age.

NEW ETCHINGS, PHOTOGRAPHS, &c.

A CHROMO-LITHOGRAPH issued by the Arundel Society as the "second annual publication for 1880" lies on our table; it is the work of M. Lemerrier, of Paris, and was produced under the superintendence of M. Schultz, after a water-colour drawing which Signor Fattorini made from Pinturicchio's painting representing 'The Virgin with Two Saints,' in the church of Monte Oliveto, near San Gimignano, in Tuscany. It is in the centre of the choir of the chapel of Paolo Tolosa, and was named by Vasari among the works of a master to whom he did scant justice. Although attributed by Rumohr to Pacchiarotto, there is no reason to doubt that this brilliant, somewhat over-defined, if not hard, distemper picture on wood, with life-size figures, is really the work of Raphael's comrade in the atelier of P. Perugino. One of his best-known and most admired pictures, this, the so-called 'Assumption,' represents, in the manner of an enlarged miniature, the appearance of the Virgin in a vesica-shaped aureole to two saints whose names have not been recognized, although one is in full pontificals, his face being obviously a portrait, and the other is a bishop in white, with a white mitre on the earth at his knees. The rays of the aureole terminate in, or are enclosed by, a double iris, between the nimbi of which the firmament is represented by a deep blue band; nine cherubs' heads are on the band; under the Virgin's bare feet are two similar heads. The background is a landscape of the school of Perugino, with rocks piled on our right, a fortress in the mid-distance on the other side. The face of the Virgin is dainty, ruddy, the expression not pathetic, but it is better in the picture than in the copy before us, although the latter is tolerably good. The draperies are hard, and like those of the painter generally, they are set and formal without being grand, still less dignified. The gaiety of the colour, the firm and careful painting, the brilliant lighting and excellent preservation of this example give to it unusual attractions. While possessing not a little of the unimpassioned, merely craftsmanlike character of Pinturicchio's art, this picture in other respects takes a middle place between Raphael's work at the time, about 1604-6, and that of their common master.

Messrs. Seeley, Jackson & Halliday have sent us a folio containing six capital examples, called 'Etchings in Old London,' the work of M. Brunet-Debaines. The interior of the Temple Church is fine and firmly drawn, solemn and vigorous. Unluckily the scale of the drawing is too large. It is wonderfully solid and rich in colour and full of force. 'The Temple Gardens' renders, with equal delicacy and sweetness, a spot which has been sadly altered of late years. It is in chequered sunlight and shadows, beautifully pencilled. There is a daintiness and grace about 'Lincoln's Inn Fields' which, while it charms, may surprise frequenters of that dingy precinct. 'St. Paul's from Bankside' comprises a group of barges and buildings, happily composed, but a little too "tinkin'" in touch for the rough and large suggestions of the scene.

Field, called 'Come unto these Yellow Sands,' representing a group of lively, if not lovely, children, gaily capering and racing on the seashore. The picture was at the Royal Academy in 1878. The original was much more brilliant than the copy is, the landscape and the figures being very crude, the faces rough and deficient in beauty.

We have received from Messrs. Mansell & Co. a small selection of photographs from pictures in the National Gallery. Some of these, especially those from early Italian works, are all that could be desired. As means of study they are far more valuable than the best prints we know, and besides, some of the pictures have never been engraved. Others, such as the Hogarth from the 'Marriage à la Mode,' are complete failures. A Perugino, the 'Virgin adorning the Infant Christ,' is not much better; nor is Van Eyck's 'Jean Arnoulphin and his Wife' at all happy. On the other hand, Del Sarto's portrait of himself is first rate, and so is Pollajuolo's 'Virgin adorning Christ.'

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTER-ETCHERS.

THE first exhibition of this Society will be held in the Hanover Gallery, Bond Street, on the 4th of April, 1881. Mean time some apprehension is said to exist on the part of etchers extensively engaged in the reproduction of pictures lest the special encouragement given by the new Society to original work may, in some indirect way, prove detrimental to their interests. This apprehension, we are assured, will be seen, when the programme of the Society comes to be published, to be without foundation. The Society, it is true, has been established "in promotion of original etching, and in the interest of painters practising that branch of art"; but there is nothing in this to prevent the eminent etchers at present chiefly engaged in copying from sending, which they are quite capable of doing, original work to the Society, and, on the strength of that work, becoming eligible as Fellows.

UNDERGROUND CITIES IN SYRIA.

TEN years ago, when the age of the mass of the domestic buildings in the stone towns of Central Syria was still to some extent an open question, you were good enough to allow me to maintain in your columns the theory regarding them which has since been established.

I shall be obliged if you can now allow me, as one of the two or three European travellers referred to by Mr. L. Oliphant in his recent book on Gilead as having visited Derat, to say a few words on the fresh problem for trans-Jordanic explorers which has been opportunely raised by Mr. Oliphant's quotation of a striking passage from Herr Wetstein's twenty years old, but in England far too little known, 'Reisebericht über Hauran und die Trachonen.' Consul Wetstein, whose book I have long had, describes his exploration, by the light of two composite candles, of a labyrinth of subterranean chambers and passages at Derat. He believes that these were the streets and bazaars of an entirely underground city, and he refers to Arab rumours of similar remains, of which Mr. Oliphant also heard, existing elsewhere.

I have, I need hardly say, no intention or wish to question Wetstein's facts. He is second only, if second, to De Vogüé in his contributions to our knowledge of this region, and he has proved himself a careful and conscientious observer. Nor do I venture positively to contradict his conclusion that the underground remains he found at Derat were the vestiges of a marvellous Troglodyte city, complete in itself and wholly subterranean. But before so startling an hypothesis is definitely accepted it requires to be pointed out that the facts, as at present before us, will admit of other explanations. It seems possible, and not improbable, that what Wet-stein saw may have been in fact the basements or stables, possibly also the cisterns or necropolis of a town similar to those existing elsewhere in the Hauran.

Unluckily when at Derat in 1868 I did not see these underground marvels. Having left England without any prospect of penetrating east of the Jordan, I had no special information as to what to look for, and we halted in Derat only for a few hours. The most striking feature about the place is the great bridge of the aqueduct, the 'Kanatir Fir'an' of the Arabs, built according to Wetstein, about A.D. 200, by a king of the Hasemide dynasty, a fact pointing to the time of the district's prosperity. There is an important Christian church, in the construction of which many columns and capitals from the buildings have been used up. But what the superficial visitor first notices is the extent of the town and the completeness of its ruin. Many of the neighbouring stone towns however stand almost uninjured. At Derat the old regular masonry has, so far as I remember, been generally levelled to within a few feet of the ground. The present population dwells in burrows, rudely roofed in with unhewn stones, so that the dwellings resemble nothing so much as low cairns. These burrows are probably, in part at least, formed in the substructures of old houses.

It is certain that at Derat, as elsewhere, the accumulations and run of ages have raised the level of the soil many feet above that of the old town. Any argument from this circumstance would, however, be met by the fact that what Wetstein saw was, in part at least, cut in the solid rock. It is important, therefore, further to remember that the houses described and pictured by De Vogüé were in part excavated. I quote the following passage from his 'Introduction' (p. 10), "Une maison était-elle à bâtir, on creusait l'étage inférieur dans la roche vive." In other places he mentions underground stables, kitchens, &c., in detail.

The Palestine Exploration Fund has, I rejoice to know, made up its mind to fulfil the long-deferred hopes of those who have wished to see it turn its attention to the unmapped and half-explored regions beyond the Jordan. Its able officers will no doubt take an early opportunity of thoroughly exploring Derat and the other sites indicated, and so solve for us this interesting puzzle. In the mean time the public will, I believe, do well to hold their judgment in suspense as to the existence in Central Syria of a new class of cities wholly, and in any strict sense of the word, subterranean.

I take this opportunity to add two notes. Mr. Oliphant, when he says that there is nothing to show that stone architecture, like that of Syria exists in Southern Arabia, in the native country of the people who subsequently in the early centuries of our era flourished in the Hauran, has, I think, overlooked Herr Wetstein's statement to the contrary effect, which I referred to in an article on the 'Stone Towns of Central Syria' in 'Illustrated Travels' for 1870. I may also note for the encouragement of travellers, that the ancient bugbears, the Sheikh of Suf and Shera-Coblan, have been more than once defied in former years with perfect impunity.

DOUGLAS W. FLEMING.

FINIS-3rd Series.

DR. SCHLICKMANN has come over to England for the purpose of removing from South Kensington Museum his Trojan collections, which have been exhibited there for the last three years. A few days, therefore, only remain for any persons who have not yet seen them to satisfy their curiosity.

It is understood that Mr. Burton's journey to Italy on behalf of the National Gallery has been fruitful.

A PICTURE attributed to Hogarth has been sequeathed to the National Gallery. It is not certain that the Trustees will accept the gift.

Mr. STANLEY will deliver the series of lectures on architecture to the students of the Royal Academy which the customs of that institution require. The evenings of the 14th, 17th, 21st, 24th, and 28th of February, and of the 5th of March next, are appointed for this purpose.

Mr. JAMES MILN, F.S.A.Scot., a record of these archaeological researches at Carnac from 1874 to 1877 was published in 1877, has in his press an account of his archaeological work for the past three years among the alignments of Kermario and the dolmens of that neighbourhood. Mr. Miln's more recent excavations have resulted in some curious discoveries which have an important bearing on several questions connected with the megalithic monuments. The work, which will be issued shortly by Mr. D. Douglas, will be profusely illustrated from drawings by Mr. Miln.

Mr. W. NIXON proposes to bring out a collection of etchings illustrating the old domestic architecture of Staffordshire, upon a similar plan to that adopted by him in dealing with the counties of Warwick and Worcester. Shropshire has had its old country houses portrayed by Mrs. Stackhouse Acton; Herefordshire by Mr. Rev. C. J. Robinson; Cheshire and Derbyshire have also been similarly celebrated, while Stafford has hitherto received less attention. Under "old" he means to include houses erected between the period when they ceased their military character and became domestic, down to about the end of the seventeenth century. The volume will be uniform in size with the author's works on Worcestershire and Warwickshire (forming the final volume of the series), and will contain at least twenty copper-plate etchings.

M. Yvon has been elected Professor of Drawing in the Ecole Polytechnique, a post which has been vacant since the resignation of the late M. L. Cogniet, many years ago.

The French papers announce the preparation of the following pictures for the next Salon. M. Haltraz has three portraits in hand; M. Bonnat is similarly occupied with likenesses of the Countess Potocka, Madame Bischofsheim, and another lady; M. J. P. Laurens is painting a portrait of Madame de Rouquette. M. Bouguereau will contribute, it is said, 'Le Baiser d'Aurore,' 'Le Sommeil de la Vierge et de l'Enfant,' and a Pietà. M. Francus will be represented by two landscapes, one being 'Lavoir à Pierrefonds,' the other 'L'Angelus. M. C. Duran is painting a portrait of General Herckmann, 'Une Muse au Tombeau,' and 'Marino Faliero, Enfant.'

The well-known picture by Millet, called 'Le Fumeur de Cochons,' has been sold for 75,000 francs.

The French Government has bought M. Jules Jouffé's picture 'Madame Roland,' which was exhibited in the last Salon. It will be placed in the Luxembourg.

The unedited manuscripts by Da Vinci, twelve in number, written in reverse, as was customary with the painter, which have long been among the treasures of the library of the French Institute, are being published in fac-simile, with their accompanying sketches and illustrative drawings and diagrams. The first volume contains notes on painting, drawing, observations on cosmology, geography, the percussion, resistance, and movement of water, light, heat, &c.

The picture by Constable which forms the star piece at Nayland Church may now be seen at the shop of Mr. Graves, the well-known restorer, in Pall Mall. The local paper from which we quoted said it had been given to Mr. Graves to restore; it was really entrusted to Mr. Graves, and has been cleaned by him.

The jewels of the French crown which it is proposed to sell include none of artistic value, and represent, it is estimated, about 5,000,000 francs. With the proceeds it is intended to establish a special fund, called the Caisse des Musées, and available for the purchase of works of art by the authorities.

It is proposed to erect by public subscription a statue of M. Alexandre Dumas in the Place Maiesherbes, Paris.

THE interest of the students' concerts of the Royal Academy of Music generally consists in the opportunities they afford of testing the value of the work carried on in the institution considered as a training-ground for future executants and composers. It is not too much to say, however, that at the orchestral concert given on Thursday week the conductor rather than the students was regarded with the greatest attention and expectancy. When the vacancy caused by the enforced retirement of Mr. Walter Macfarren was filled up by the appointment of Mr. William Shakespeare, the action of the committee of management was naturally regarded with some surprise. Its wisdom, however, is not likely to be further disputed by those who were present at the above-mentioned concert. Mr. Shakespeare then showed his possession of qualities which, with further experience, will probably place him in a high position among conductors. It was in his direction of the choir that his ability chiefly declared itself. In Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, "As the hart pants," the clearness and vigour of Mr. Shakespeare's bat ensured an admirable performance, the attack and precision of the voices being worthy of the warmest commendation. The concert thus ably commenced was continued satisfactorily, the work done being, on the whole, above the average. Two orchestral compositions by pupils were introduced. The first, an 'Eclogue,' by Mr. William Sewell, Novello Scholar, was a vague and formless trifle, the feeling for orchestral colour alone redeeming it from complete failure; the other, a vigorous and thoughtfully written concert overture, by Mr. G. J. Bennett, Balfé Scholar, proved in every way more satisfactory. Mention must also be made of a clever cadenza to the first movement of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in c minor, which was carefully played by Miss Beatrice Davenport. Mr. Charlton T. Speer, notwithstanding evident ability, was unequal to the task of grappling with the first movement of Rubinstein's Concerto in d minor, and it is a question whether music of this class should be placed in the hands of students. Regarding another pianist, Miss Dinah Shapley, Lady Goldsmid Scholar, the guarded terms generally applicable to those in a state of pupilage need not be employed. This young lady interpreted the first movement of Schumann's Concerto with such perfect technique, and such insight into the meaning of the composer's exquisite ideas, that she may be considered as already a competent artist. The solo vocalists, who in general are weaker than the pianists, were on this occasion of greater promise than usual. Miss Margaret Cockburn, soprano, would have done better if she had been less oppressed by nervousness, and her selection of "Qui la voce" was not well advised. Miss Hilda Wilson, contralto, and Mr. B. Davies, tenor, have the making of capable singers. The continued and increasing prosperity of the Royal Academy, in the face of a larger number of competitive institutions, is an irrefragable proof of public confidence; and such improvements as may still be necessary will come better from within than in answer to appeals from without by forces whose impartiality and disinterestedness might easily be called in question.

As Mr. Grove truly remarks in the programme of last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert, the number of violin concertos of intrinsic value as music is exceedingly limited. In too many instances composers have been content with writing a brilliant solo part, the orchestral accompaniment having no interest whatever. This fault cannot be laid to the charge of Herr Gernsheimas regards his Violin Concerto in d, Op. 42, introduced by M. Emil Sauret on Saturday. The themes on which the work is founded are not very striking or original, but they are cleverly treated in the symphonic manner, and the solo part forms an integral portion of the scheme. Again, the composer shows a laudable feeling for contrast, the first movement being meditative and lyrical, the second somewhat romantic, and the finale bright without flippancy. The concerto is not a creation of genius, but the musicianship displayed in its construction is of a high order. It is the latest work of a composer who, it may be said, was hitherto known in this country chiefly by a Trio in e, played at the Popular Concerts. M. Sauret's thin tone and perpetual tremolo were objectionable in the first and second movements, but the Belgian violinist played the brilliant passages in the finale with immense verve and passion, the applause accorded him being fully deserved. There was nothing else in the concert to demand criticism, but a word of protest must again be uttered against the artistic vandalism of transforming a chamber work into one for orchestra. The Theme with Variations in Schubert's Octet is not usually heard when the work is given at St. James's Hall, and for this reason its performance in the manner intended by the composer would have been interesting. Mr. Arthur Oswald's vocal selections were not by any means praiseworthy.

The name of the Bohemian composer Anton Dvorák is gradually becoming familiar to our concert audiences. Introduced at first by the performance of his Slavonic Dances at the Crystal Palace, he has since been favourably known through a Sextet for strings given last season at the Monday Popular Concerts; a Slavonic Rhapsody for orchestra was also brought forward at one of the last series of Richter Concerts. Another work of his, a String Quartet in e flat, Op. 51, was performed for the first time at last Saturday's Popular Concert in St. James's Hall. Dvorák is one of the comparatively few composers of the present day whose works show a pronounced individuality of style—at times, it must be admitted, somewhat eccentric, but frequently full of poetic beauty. How far the peculiarities to be met with in his music are the outcome of his nationality is a question the discussion of which would carry us too far at present. That there are turns of melody and rhythmical effects characteristic of Czechish and Magyar national music is indisputable, but this admission does not detract from the merit of Dvorák's music; it simply indicates the direction in which his genius tends. The new quartet is a very interesting, though somewhat unequal, work. It is too long—the prevailing fault of much modern music—and the form is not always as clear as might be desired, but many of the themes are of great beauty. The first allegro and the finale strike us on a first hearing as being the best movements; the finale especially is marked by astonishing vigour and force. The first movement has some general resemblance of style to Schubert's so-called 'Hungarian' Quartet in A minor, and, were it somewhat compressed, would be all but perfect. A fault of the work is that it has two slow movements; the first of these, an elegy ('Dumka'), is, it is true, interrupted by a waltz measure of great beauty and much originality, but the whole movement is very long, and it is followed by an almost equally lengthy romance. This we think an artistic mistake. The inventors of the recognized quartet and symphony form well knew what they were doing when they followed the slow movement by a minuet or schërzo. The necessity of contrast was recognized. Here, to a large extent, it is ignored, and the work suffers in consequence. In spite of this blemish, Dvorák's quartet is a most interesting work, and Mr. Chappell has, we think very wisely, announced its repetition on Monday, January 3rd. It need only be added that the performance by Madame Norman-Néruda, Messrs. Rios, Zerbini, and Piatti, was perfection. Madame Norman-Néruda brought forward at the same concert another of Handel's violin sonatas, the pianoforte accompaniment having been filled up from the figured bass by Mr. Charles Halle. The one in question (in D major) was published for the first time last year in the German Handel Society's edition of the composer's works. It was brilliantly played by Madame Néruda, but we cannot agree with her reading. Handel's allegros are not prestissimos; and she took them at a pace which, though not a note was missed, entirely destroyed, in our opinion, the dignity of Handel's music. Mr. Eugene d'Albert made his second appearance at these concerts on Saturday, fully confirming the favourable impression previously produced. His reading of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 7, was open to criticism in some points, especially in the third movement; but his performance of one of Chopin's Nocturnes and of Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (with Madame Néruda and Signor Piatti) left little or nothing to desire. Madame Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist.

It would have been difficult to improve on the programme of the concert with which on Saturday evening Mr. Cowen concluded his first series at St. James's Hall. There is so much outcry with regard to the non-recognition of native talent that it deserves honourable mention that of the nine pieces given on Saturday six were by English composers. The concert commenced with an Overture to 'Titania,' by Mr. H. C. Nixon, a professor of music residing at St. Leonards. We confess to an inability to see any connexion between the music and the Queen of the Fairies, but this is a matter of very secondary importance. Speaking of the work simply as music, we find much in it to commend and also something to blame. Mr. Nixon's themes are very pleasing and melodious, with an occasional slight suggestion of Sterndale Bennett and Mendelssohn; his orchestration is effective, being well balanced, sonorous, and by no means deficient in contrast of colour. On the other hand, the overture is decidedly too long, and the departures from orthodox form in which the composer has indulged do not improve it. The performance was excellent. A second novelty was a "tone-picture," entitled 'The Ebbing Tide,' by Mr. J. F. Barnett—an unassuming little piece, written for small orchestra, full of grace (like the composer's music in general) and charmingly scored. Bach's Triple Concerto in D, for piano, violin, and flute, is so rarely heard in public as to deserve to rank among the novelties of the evening. It is in the old master's most genial style—contrapuntal throughout (for Bach could hardly be otherwise), but with the art so completely concealed that not the least stiffness or dryness is apparent. The finale especially overflows with melody. The pianoforte part was admirably played by Madame Frickenhaus, whom the music exactly suited, and she was excellently supported by Mr. V. Nicholson (violin) and Mr. W. F. Barrett (flute). The scena 'Hero and Leander,' by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, which came next on the programme, gained the Lucas medal last year at the Royal Academy of Music, where Mr. Thomas is a student. It is a work of very great promise, especially from the dramatic instinct shown in it. It was excellently rendered by Mrs. Osgood, who, however, was not in her best voice; the accompaniments, also, were at times too loud.

The special feature of the concert was the production of Mr. Cowen's new Symphony, No. 3, in C minor. It is now upwards of seven years since his Second Symphony (in F) was produced at the Crystal Palace; and seven years at Mr. Cowen's time of life should count for a good deal in the development of his powers. We are glad to be able to recognize in the new work a distinct advance on its predecessor. The Third Symphony, we learn from the book of words, is a record of a visit to Scandinavia; it is, in fact, Mr. Cowen's 'Scandinavian' Symphony, just as Mendelssohn's third is his 'Scotch.' There is, however, this difference between the two—that Mr. Cowen's is more distinctly programme music, his second movement being intended to depict "the impressions of one who, standing upon the margin of some Norwegian fiord, beholds mountain and water bathed in the moonlight of a summer eve"; while the schërzo is a musical representation of a sleigh-ride in winter. The first movement of the symphony is charming alike in its themes and treatment; the two principal subjects are particularly felicitous. The adagio is little, if at all, inferior; the episodic passage for the horns which occurs in the middle of the movement is both new and striking. The schërzo is undeniably pretty, but more of captandum than the preceding movements; while the finale seems on a first hearing the least satisfactory part of the work. The subjects are cleverly developed, but are deficient in charm—a fault which can certainly not be found with the rest of the symphony; and the reintroduction of phrases from the earlier movements is so managed as to produce an effect of incoherence rather than of unity of style. The symphony as a whole is so excellent that we should advise Mr. Cowen to reconsider, if not to rewrite, the finale. There is much "local colour" imparted to the work by the use of peculiar melodic progressions, and the scoring throughout is masterly. The symphony was excellently performed, and enthusiastically received. Mr. Cowen's suite 'The Language of Flowers,' produced at a previous concert, was repeated by desire, and the concert concluded with Beethoven's third 'Leonora' Overture. It is due to Mr. Cowen to congratulate him not only on the spirit and enterprise he has shown, but on the decided improvement in his conducting, and in consequence in the orchestral playing, during the series. The performance on Saturday gave very little room for criticism.

Although the performances of the Brixton Choral Society, under Mr. William Lemare, at the Angell Town Institution, are imperfect, inasmuch as they lack the full orchestra, yet from time to time novelties and revivals are brought forward which tend to lift the society above the level of merely local undertakings. Such was the case on Monday last, when Weber's music to 'Preciosa' was given, probably for the first time in England, in its complete form. Wolf's drama, for which it was written, met with but little success, but, as the music was too good to be lost, the story was arranged by C. O. Stern in the form of a monologue, and a translation of this by the Rev. J. Troutbeck was recited on Monday by Mr. Charles Fry. In the case of the performance of a similar work, Schubert's 'Rosamunde,' such an addition is unnecessary, but in 'Preciosa' it is inevitable, owing to the fragmentary nature of the music. The latter consists of an overture and ballet airs, march, several gipsy choruses, a soprano air, and some "melodramatic" music. Weber's delightful strains, in which local colour is introduced in just the right proportion, made a strong impression, and the performance was excellent. Hiller's 'Song of Victory' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' were also well interpreted, though more spirit might have been infused into the finale of Mendelssohn's work. The accompaniments were rendered by Miss Alma Saunders and Mr. Humphrey Stark at the piano, and Mr. Charles Wilkes at the organ. Madame Worrell, the only solo vocalist, sang exceedingly well throughout the evening.

Musical Gossip.

MR. STANLEY LUCAS has resigned the secretaryship of the Philharmonic Society, and the post has been offered to, and accepted by, Mr. Henry Hersee.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society's first performance of the 'Messiah' in St. James's Hall took place on Friday week. It might have been supposed that the radical changes in the execution would have afforded an excellent opportunity for the correction of those time-honoured mistakes in certain choruses, namely, "And He shall purify," and "He trusted in God"; but the passages in question were once more wrongly given. With these exceptions the choruses were very finely delivered. Of the soloists, Madame Mary Cummings and Mr. Bridson were the most artistic, and in justice to Mr. T. Harper it should be mentioned that his rendering of the obbligato in "The trumpet shall sound" was exceptionally fine.

As the students' concert of Madame Sainton-Dolby's Vocal Academy occurred on the same evening as that of Mr. Owen, we can only give a bare record of the event. The pupils who appeared for the first time were Miss Franklin and Miss Fusselle soprano, and Miss Amy Carter and Miss Winthrop contralto. Two former pupils, Miss Daman, who has now taken a high position in her profession, and Miss Blackwell, took part in the programme, and the vocal music was relieved by violin solos rendered by Mlle. Vaillant. Herr Leopold presided at the piano-forte, and M. Sainton conducted the concerted music.

The difficulties which had arisen in connexion with the projected representation of Wagner's 'Nibelungen Ring' at Berlin have been surmounted, and the work will be produced at the Royal Opera-house; so, at least, rumour has it.

The prejudice against Wagner's music would appear to be slowly dying out in Paris. Last Sunday at M. Paderewski's concert the beautiful closing scene from 'Die Walküre' was performed and received with enthusiastic applause.

BERLIOZ's overture, 'King Lear,' an early work, was revived at the Châtelet Concerts on Sunday week, and received with immense favour.

A new opera, on the subject of Molière's 'L'Amour Médecin,' was produced at the Paris Opéra Comique on Monday. The music, by M. Ferdinand Pons, is said to be appropriately quaint, simple, and elegant, and to bear a strong contrast to the modern style.

A new comic opera, entitled 'La Mère des Compagnons,' by M. Hervé, has been produced at the Paris Folies Dramatiques with but little success.

HERR ADALBERT VON GOLDSMIDT, the composer of an extraordinary work, 'Die sieben Todsünden,' has published the libretto of a new opera, 'Heliantus.'

DAUGHTER (Maiden) — 'Quicksands,' or, 'The Pillars of Society,' a Play in Four Acts. Translated from the Norwegian of Henrik Ibsen by William Archer.
PRINCE OF WALES — 'A New Trial,' a Drama in Four Acts. From the Italian of P. Giacometti.

As a dramatic satire the 'Pillars of Society' of Ibsen is worthy of the reputation of its author. With a relentless vigour—which accounts for Ibsen's unpopularity among his own countrymen—the most familiar vices of modern society are scourged and lashed. Those shams on which the bases of society are supposed to rest, the assumption that the end in matters commercial justifies the means, and the worship generally of hypocrisy, respectability, and success, are attacked in a manner absolutely scathing. The developments of vice which are depicted are characteristic of a small country town, in which Ibsen has placed his action. Far beyond these limits extends, however, the irony which links itself to the satire of all ages, and would be as true of ancient Athens or modern London as of the obscure and nameless town to which it is applied. With the satire is connected a good and telling story, which introduces some novel, if not very powerful, types of character, and which in its progress reaches a point of interest altogether poignant. In the manner in which the story is rendered subservient to the teaching the hand of a master is shown. A very high skill is exhibited in bringing by commonplace temptations a commonplace mind to a point at which it conceives, plans, and executes what is, in fact, murder, and then finds that in attacking the life of a stranger it has brought about the death of a son. An escape from the guilt of filicide—if the word may be used—is provided, and the play remains within the limits of comedy. Extremely fine comedy it is, and we shall be glad to know more of its author's workmanship.

The translation appears to be literal. Our only fault is with the first half of the title. In giving to the 'Samfundets Støtter,' literally 'Pillars of Society,' the preliminary title of 'Quicksands,' the adapter seems to accentuate the serious interest of the play at the expense of its satirical purpose. It is the so-called pillars of society that Ibsen attacks; the story is a mere means to an end. Mr. Vernon played competently the hero, and Mr. Dacre, Mrs. Billington, Miss F. Addison, and Miss Grahame acted conscientiously in other characters.

Of the greatest characters in the repertory of Signor Salvini, one character only, that of Corrado in 'La Morte Civile' of Giacometti, was not presented by that actor during his recent visits to London. In Paris this proved the most popular of Signor Salvini's performances, and the result of his success in it was the presentation next year at the Odéon of a version of the play by M. Auguste Vitu, the theatrical critic of Le Figaro. This adaptation, the name of which was 'Conrad,' seems to have rendered some service to the author of the English version which is now set before the public. With some judgment, however, the latest adapter has compressed the piece as well as altered it. In its present shape, with the character of Monsignore Ruvo considerably softened, and with the dialogue and action quickened, the story now called 'A New Trial' is a powerful and impressive if rather a painful play. The change of title is so far regrettable, that its effect is to add to melo-dramatic incidents, in themselves subordinate, the importance of which it robs the problem to be developed. What rights, if any, has a man who for crime is sentenced to imprisonment for life? is the question to be answered. That he has none is indicated in the title of 'La Morte Civile,' which, however, could not be used in England. Some rights, however valueless or negative, a criminal, so long as he lives, must under existing laws be held to possess. He has a right to rank as the husband of a wife he may never see, and so to prevent her from marrying again. The oppressiveness of the law in this respect is shown in the play of Giacometti. 'La Morte Civile' presents a husband escaping from the galleys, and startling by his unexpected return his wife, who, with her child, is enjoying the innocent but compromising shelter afforded her by a kind-hearted if heterodox physician. A calm consideration of the subject leads the escaped convict to the conclusion that the best thing for him to do is to die, leaving his wife free to contract a second marriage and his daughter unaware of the stigma attached to her name. He commits suicide accordingly, and in so doing makes every one happy except a malignant priest, who from the basest of motives has persecuted the heroine. This is a hard lesson to accept. It is, however, taught in a play which is powerful throughout, is impregnated with the true dramatic spirit, and has some scenes of remarkable and even harrowing intensity. A scene in which the father, supplicating with tears and prayers for one look of affection from his daughter, finds he inspires her with fright and aversion, and sees her lavish on another the careases for which he pines, is almost too cruel for the stage. Other situations, while less distressing, have genuine power, and the play, although some exercise of credulity is demanded from the audience, is fine work. It is well acted so far as regards the principal characters. Mr. Coghlan has not been seen to such advantage as in the rôle of Corrado, in which he shows with real force the tortures of a passionate nature torn to pieces by regret and remorse. At one or two points Mr. Coghlan's action approached intensity. It is to be regretted that the death scene is too long. Miss Amy Roselle, who as the Princess de Bouillon in 'Adrienne Lecouvreur' was seen last week in a rôle wholly unsuited to her, was well fitted to the part of Rosalia, the heroine, and played it with great power and corresponding effect. Two pictures, each admirable in its way, were afforded by Mr. Flockton as the priest and Mr. Fernandez as the benevolent physician. Mr. Flockton's get-up was perfect, and his expression of ferocity craftily concealed by sanctimony was careful, accurate, and effective. Mr. Fernandez may be said to have realized the character of the benevolent physician, whose theological opinions subjected him to constant persecution. Miss Eva Sothorn played agreeably enough in a small part.

THE 'AGAMEMNON' AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

THE performance in Greek of the 'Agamemnon' of Æschylus which was got up in the summer by some energetic Oxford undergraduates, and given with deserved success at that university and at three leading public schools, was last week reproduced for the benefit of Londoners at St. George's Hall. The interval that had elapsed since the play was last given (at Harrow, where I saw it) had been by no means wasted by the actors. There was a decided air of maturity about the performance, and more unity of action. This in a genuine attempt was but natural; for the idea was so novel that it could not be expected to take satisfactory shape all at once—to spring forth like Athens in full panoply from the brain of Zeus. Even now there are points which longer practice would improve, but on the whole a high average of excellence has been attained.

Demy 8vo. with a Map, 14s.

The charm and brilliancy of the letters from South America when they read during the past twelve months in these columns will not be found to have evaporated with their journey in a volume. The interest of a survey of the vast continent, as once more vivid, we believe, is justified in saying, and more just than any which has been hitherto attempted could not be exhausted in opportunities of a single perusal. Only a lifetime of trained observation could have enabled Mr. Gale to seize the essential features of the many regions he visited, so that each falls into its place in the picture. But the effect is produced not by rough dashes, but by a series of delicate touches of personal fancy in travel. The reader, who reads by feeling that he understands the physical capacities of the whole, and the future fortunes of its population, has been given as good a sense of arriving at his destination as the author himself. He does not so much read as see and hear what the tourist saw and heard." Times, Dec. 10.

SKETCHES IN THE HUNTING FIELD.

Illustrated by JOHN STURGESSE.

Second Edition, New and Cheaper Edition. 6s.

[This day.

Are light and lively, and have the merit of being dashed off closely from the life with telling touches of just Mr. Watson has been fortunate, besides, in finding such an artist as Mr. Sturgesse to illustrate his king." Times.

By ROBERT DAVIES, F.S.A.

THE RACEHORSE IN TRAINING.

WITH SOME HINTS ON RACING AND RACING REFORM.

By WILLIAM DAY.

Demy 8vo. 16s. Third Edition.

"Mr. Day has not only written a useful book, but one that in its simple and straightforward style does no credit to his literary ability." Times.

OFFICIAL HANDBOOK FOR THE NATIONAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR COOKERY.

Containing Lessons on Cookery; forming the Course of Instruction in the School. With List of Utensils Necessary, and Lessons on Cleaning Utensils.

Compiled by "R. O. C."

Large crown 8vo. Sixth Edition, 8s.

[Just ready.

"The good point about the book is that it pre-supposes complete ignorance on the part of the pupil, and is left to haphazard; every quantity is given in its exact and due proportion, and the price of each ingredient carefully set down. All these lessons, moreover, have been practically tested in the National Training School, and may therefore be accepted in good faith. It is not, however, to be supposed that any recipes or rare and costly dishes are to be found in this book, the 'first principles' of good cookery is what it professes to teach, and certainly the method of tuition is direct and easy to follow." Times.

THIS DAY,
MR. HUNTER'S SHILLING BOOK ON INDIA.

ENGLAND'S WORK IN INDIA.

By W. W. HUNTER, C.L.E. LL.D.

It is much to be regretted that a re-construct of British rule in India, states the problems which are now arising with regard to the future of the country, and the welfare of the people, and endeavours to gauge the precise dimensions of those problems, and to suggest definite measures towards their solution.
